CELIA

IN SEARCH OF A HUSBAND.

BY A MODERN ANTIQUE.

"There wanted yet the master-work, the end
Of all yet done; a creature, who not prone
And brute as other creatures, but endued
With sanctity of reason, — — — — — — and from thence Magnanimous, to correspond with Heaven,
But grateful to acknowledge whence his good Descends."

CELIA.

CHAP. I.

"For twenty or thirty years past, it has been the fashion to consider luxury as one of the greatest national advantages, and all the wisdom of antiquity, in that particular, as erroneous; still, however, I must remain a professed ancient on that head, and continue to think those luxuries prejudicial to states, by which so many vices are introduced."

THE proposals of Mr. Danbury were submitted to our heroine by the Baronet next morning.—Celia put a negative on the matter instantly.

"I believe he is not very sanguine in his hopes," said Sir Harry, "nor did I encourage him to expect your favour; but this does not proceed from his humility, but rather from the retiredness of your character, which, if you were not in all other respects the most charming of your sex, he would be apt to term fastidious.—These are his own words," continued Sir Harry; "I did not argue the point, being assured he had to meet a refusal, which will, in all probability, make him find a new expression, by which to distinguish your cruel insensibility."

"How can a man make proposals of so serious a nature, upon an acquaintance so transient as our's?" said Celia.—"Can happiness be expected, where marriages are thus arranged?"'

"Danbury has considered the matter deeply," said Sir Harry, smiling; "he has consulted his lawyer."

"How insolent!" said Celia, with unfeigned surprise.

"Yes, my dear girl, he has been with Berton, making a few necessary enquiries," continued the Baronet; "such as, what expectations you have—how old our good aunt aunt Mansfield is—whether there is any timber on the estate, &c. &c. As you may suppose, Berton was not exactly the man to whom such queries could be put with impunity; yet he replied to him in a way that by no means damped his passion; on the contrary, it brought him to me, as I have related."

Celia instantly comprehended those allusions of Belford, as addressed to her speculating lover, at Lady Desmond's party; and a pang of regret wrung her bosom, as she reflected that combining circumstances had in a manner compelled her to forego the favourable opinion she had entertained of Belford.

"If to study the character of the man on whom you will bestow your hand is so essential to your ideas of married life, my dear Celia," said Sir Harry, "how is it possible you can remain indifferent to my friend Belford? It must be obvious to you that he is most sincerely attached to you."

"I fear," said Celia, and she checked the half-formed reply—" that is, I am, as Fanny says, an insensible being."

Sir Harry looked as though he was not satisfied by the corrected sentiment.—" I hope you are not refining too much," said he.—" Belford is, of all men, calculated to make your happiness; his knowledge of the world is extensive, his principles firm."

Celia involuntarily shook her head.

" How! you would not insinuate that he is unworthy?" said Sir Harry, with warmth.

" I applaud your zeal," said Celia; " it is what I believe to be the very essence of friendship. Forgive me, if at this moment I declare Mr. Belford has sunk in my estimation; I am not at liberty to say why; but circumstances, according to my way of thinking, have combined to make him appear less amiable than I once thought him."

" You are in error, I will vouch for him," said the Baronet.—" Some insidious enemy has poisoned your mind; he will rise superior to their machinations; and you, Celia—yes, I pronounce it—you will rescind this short-lived perjury to the purest and most honourable passion that ever tortured the breast of man."

Celia was replying, when the object of their controversy was announced. The interruption caused a pause, that arrested the attention of Mr. Belford—he stood irresolute.—"If my vanity would not stand impeached by the avowal," said he, "I could be tempted to believe you were talking of me.—Was it scandal?" he continued, addressing Celia.

"I hope I know it was," said Sir Harry.

Celia's cheeks were suffused with blushes; she looked reproachfully towards Sir Harry, and curtsying to Mr. Belford, declared she must see her sister, and ask the use of the carriage for an hour, withdrew.

Belford endeavoured to lead the Baronet to the subject that had engrossed their conversation on his arrival. Sir Harry evaded it, after ingenuously confessing, that Miss Delacour and himself had dissented on a point of some delicacy, which he yet believed would be cleared up, highly to the advantage of the injured party.—Belford was thoughtful.—"I had considered this girl as so superior to her sex in general," said Belford, "that I had not made up my mind for any disappointment; nay, I had flattered myself that she esteemed me; but yesterday, on a sudden, she became reserved, if not capricious; and to-day, there was none of that ingenuous sweetness so conspicuous in her character. Admitting that she has discovered her power over my heart, I did not think her capable of exulting in my misery: I have not presumed to avow myself; and if I had, should have expected from her delicacy, as from her candour, that consideration which a man of honour must feel his due."

"Undoubtedly," said the Baronet;—"and believe me, Belford, Celia is incapable of a conduct so unamiable. No, my friend, she is not capricious; her feelings are quick, her benevolence unbounded;—and at this moment, I consider her as the dupe dupe of some well-dissembled artifice:—but such is the humility of her disposition, that I am persuaded there could not be a more grateful meed to the fondest of her admirers, than that recantation she would voluntarily accord, on the instant she discovered her error."

"Then I have something to expect," said Belford, with a forced smile; "for it is obvious to me that I have fallen under her displeasure—how, Heaven only knows: that I shall appreciate my restoration to her favour, I may sincerely avow: she is woven so round my heart, that all language must fail, in elucidating my feelings; and I know not, my dear Townly, if this precious meed will not stamp the fate of your friend.—I could not bear her hatred; and her love is what I dare not hope, though I feel I deserve it."

The Baronet wanted courage to reply, as his reason and observation would have suggested; and Mr. Belford, overpowered by feelings too intense, even for friendship to witness, retired somewhat hastily.

"You will dine with us," said Sir Harry, as he followed his amiable friend through the gallery.

"If I can," said Belford, as he waved his hand in token of adieu.

We will leave the Baronet to his ruminations, which, we fear to state, were not too much in favour of female stability, and follow our heroine on her errand of mercy. Celia strolled through the green-house, and, after selecting a few plants, took a turn in the garden. She waited anxiously for the appearance of her anonymous friend, but she came not. Seeing the gardener, with whom she had conversed the preceding day, she asked if he had heard how the sick lady was that morning?

"No, Madam," said the man; "but her maid-servant and the child are somewhere about the grounds.—There they are," continued he, pointing to a young girl and a child in a distant walk.

Celia

Celia hastened towards them.—" How is your mistress?" said Celia, addressing the girl.

" She is very poorly indeed to-day," said the girl.

" Is she too ill to walk in the grounds this morning?" asked Celia.

" She is in bed," said the girl.

" Take this letter to your mistress," said our heroine.—" Perhaps this little fellow will remain with me while you go;" and she held out her hand to the sweet boy.—The child yielded to her wish, and seating herself on a bench, she engaged the little stranger's attention, by culling a nosegay for him, and answering to his imperfect articulation, with all that softness so peculiarly attractive to children. " A mother's heart may glow with conscious pride, as she gazes on a treasure like this," said Celia, and she kissed the ruby lips of the smiling boy; " but a deserted, a dishonoured woman—Good Heavens! what must be the feelings of a mother thus situated, to leave an

an innocent like this to a world that looks down upon the sins of humble life with fastidious scorn, to leave thee to a father, who has sent thy best protector to an early grave!—What a sad perspective!" and her thoughts wandered to Hadley; she saw the blooming boy under the care of her aunt, while she was relating the sad story of his entombed mother.—"She is dying, I am persuaded," said Celia, and the tears coursed down her cheeks. The child regarded her attentively—he climbed her knee, and folding his arms round her neck, kissed her tears away.—"This office is not new," said Celia; "it is a strong trait of nature.—Yes, I will protect you," said she, as she strained the unconscious child of her bounty to a bosom, in which the purest feelings of benevolence were throbbing, to an excess oppressive, though not painful. The girl returned, and presenting a note, was retiring with her charge. Celia motioned her to remain, and, breaking the seal, read as follows:—

"I FEEL

"I FEEL too ill, to say all I wish, at this moment. Madam, your condescension overpowers me. I must believe all you say; and, in that case, am more humbled than ever. I could have excused his loving you, now I know you; but I perceive it was a subterfuge, to cast me from his heart. He has done it effectually.—I will say more, if possible, this evening.—Heaven bless, and make you happy, as you deserve to be, prays the lost, abandoned

"Make my compliments to your mistress," said Celia, as she folded the billet of the fading Jessy, "and tell her I shall hope to hear from her this evening."

The girl promised to obey her order; and our heroine, taking an affectionate leave of her youthful friend, repaired to the carriage. Her reflections, in her short ride, ride, were many and complicated; she could not regret that part which she had taken, in the fate of the wasting sufferer; yet that she had been made the unconscious scourge of the hapless penitent, was deeply offensive to her feelings.

"Despotic, cruel man," said Celia, mentally, "how insolent does vice make you! while undetected, what can check thy career? A husband! Surely, if I know my heart, it will ever remain indifferent to thy power, oh wily artificers! Worlds should not tempt me to yield my heart, till the faith, the morality, the practical religion of its secret choice, made the offering at once a tribute to your worth, and an humble instrument of your happiness." Yet whom to name as the prejudged treasurer of that heart, assuredly in the possession of its mistress, became a matter of doubt; and Celia blushed at the hastiness of that decision which had, in her eyes, made Belford the destroyer of Jessy.—"The system appears too complicated, too like a professed libertine, to attach tach to Belford," said Celia.—" I will suspend my judgment, till I am further informed ;" and, with this qualifying sentiment, she entered the drawing-room of Lady Townly.

" My dear Celia, you have put me to inconceivable distress, by detaining the carriage so long," said her Ladyship ; " I have an immensity of business on my hands this morning."--Celia made her apologies. " Let me see," continued her Ladyship, referring to her tablets—" to Shepherd's for lamps, Wedgwood's and Spode's, for novelties, Grange's, ices—take a peep at the Marchioness of ———, just to see how her rooms are arranged, and adopt a style in direct opposition, and so avoid servile imitations.—I must do all this," said her Ladyship, with an appropriate apostrophe.

" It is doing a great deal to very little purpose," said Celia. " Have you considered the expence, Fanny ?"

" That is an after consideration," said her Ladyship ; " these sort of people know us, us, and they put a profit upon our fancies, which amply repays them for the credit they give."

"Then you know you are imposed upon?" said Celia.

"We guess as much, my dear girl; but the thing is unavoidable, and I never see my tradespeople. Wilson is an admirable manager, and takes all this off my hands.—Pounds, shillings, and pence, are absolutely standing in your eyes, my dear little calculator," said Lady Townly; "dismiss the vulgar assemblage, and come with me; I will shew you how to spend hundreds with eclat."

Celia followed to the carriage, in the vain hope of checking the projected expenditure. They chose lamps, recommended by all the trick of modern flattery; they were classical, designed by an artist of eminence, and upon the true costume.—The novelties were equally well introduced; but when Celia asked their use, the artizan (for there is no such being as a tradesman now), now), declared they were universally adopted in the higher circles; and all persons who had travelled were assured they were safe, in admitting them in their mansions, for the vases of the ancients were objects of veneration—"But not of imitation," thought Celia; "and though, as an Englishwoman, I would hail every advance that persevering genius should illustrate, I can see no reason why we are to consider bottles and jars elegant or ornamental, because they were in use some hundred years since.—This is the era of human invention," sighed the unfashionable Celia, "of gross imposition: yet are the imposers less censurable than those on whom they impose? No man, however great his talents, shall talk me out of my reason, nor persuade me that the varied colours of the rainbow, when separately arranged, form an appearance perfectly unique; it is absolute insanity."—They proceeded to Grange's;—Celia listened to the orders of her sister.

"Let the whole be managed with your usual usual taste," said her Ladyship; "do not spare."

The man promised punctuality, and they drove to the Marchioness of ———.

"Have your eyes about you, Celia," said Lady Townly; "observe the order of her rooms, that I may be correct in any of the alterations I may find it necessary to make."

Celia declared it was very probable that her astonishment might supersede her power to be accurate.

"I see you are laughing at me," said Lady Townly; "but these things have grown into importance of late; so much has been said and written on style, and the papers are so descriptive, that one is called upon to be minute, in order to avoid certain odium."

"What sacrifices are made to common sense, by such as are so decidedly fashionable!" said Celia, "as if it could be essential to your consequence in life, that the newspapers should announce your folly; for it is is folly to be sedulous about such trifles.—How many laugh internally at your best attempts, while the cruelty of wasting a fortune, that might, judiciously disseminated, relieve the wants of many, and lay up treasures for yourself in a world beyond this—it is the utmost stretch of supineness, ingratitude," said Celia.—" Forgive me, Fanny;—but when I reflect that you refused your assistance, when Mrs. Welgrave claimed your aid for a suffering family, and I now behold you squandering a little fortune on the mere gew-gaws of the day, with no purpose, save the wish of pleasing the world, I am tempted to regret that your power is so unbounded."

" You are quite a democrat," said Lady Townly, laughing.—" Those levelling principles, my dear Celia, would destroy trade.—I perceive you are the woman of the people;—but believe me, the system is falling into disrepute, since it has been discovered that poverty, and not principle, makes a modern patriot."

"I am only zealous where I love," said Celia.—"I have not the vanity to offer opinions, or a wish to dictate to you—I would awaken your feelings, because I am assured, that if you were once to let reason take the lead, your happiness would be perfect, which is not the case at present.—You are ever pursuing some evanescent pleasure, some fleeting phantom, that perishes from your memory, leaving no trace, save its effect on your purse;—it is a sad, a lamentable waste of life;—and, to my unfashionable ideas, so painful a contemplation, that owning such feelings, I consider myself censurable in remaining in London."

"In a little time, my dear Celia," said Lady Townly, "we shall leave this naughty town, and you cannot imagine how rural I am, when once I get into the shades."

Celia looked sceptically; but the carriage drawing up to the Marchioness's, prevented further argument. A numerous retinue of well-dressed lacqueys attended the ladies through the vestibule, while the servant deputed to usher them to the drawing-room, unliveried, and powdered with nicest care, appeared to our heroine a more respectable dressed man, than many men of rank whom she had met in society: but her sister's application of the term democrat would by no means have suited the opinion of Celia in this point; for while she secretly lamented the degeneracy of style, so obvious in the higher circles, it appeared equally inappropriate, that a servant, in any capacity, should assume the garb of a gentleman.

After passing through a suite of apartments, each more magnificent than the last, they entered a boudoir, in which the Marchioness was seated, attired in the most fashionable undress.

"You are visible at last," said her Ladyship, raising her eye-glass.—"Well, I rejoice to see you once again.—Entré," she continued, and, in the next moment, Lord Quadrige issued from a side door. "This creature asked leave to retire," said the Marchioness;—"he thought it was Desmond's carriage, and I had felt persecution in that shape, and was merciful to his nerves."

"You are always considerate, and eminently discerning," said my Lord; "for you kindly abbreviated my banishment, when you discovered that this was the sphere in which I live, and breathe, and own the purest delight;" and taking a seat by our heroine, he breathed a long-drawn sigh, with a look and gesture perfectly in unison.

"Miss Delacour should learn the value of her preeminent attractions," said the Marchioness; "for I declare to you, Madam, I never heard Quadrige utter a compliment with so much apparent sincerity."

"I trust I shall value each as they deserve," said Celia, smiling.

"You are vastly condescending," said the Marchioness; and turning to Lady Townly, she added, in a half whisper—"Have you not delayed your sister's entré somewhat somewhat too long?—she is a very lovely woman—that is, she has a graceful form, and a most expressive countenance; but her mind appears matured beyond youth."

Lady Townly replied, with expressive regrets, "that it was entirely at the suggestion of an aunt, who had educated her sister, and would never have permitted her to come out, had she not devised a plea for drawing her from the vale."

Celia blushed deeply;—she heard all that was said, and her real motive, in her London visit, passed over her mind, with a feeling indescribably acute.

"You find London quite a new world," said the Marchioness, addressing Celia.

"It is very amusing, in some respects," said our heroine;—"but I would not live in it for any length of time."

"Well, that is astonishing!" said the lady hostess; "it is so fascinating to a novice.—Really I should be quite disappointed, if I were your sister;—for one expects to meet entertainment from the re- marks, and wonder, and surprise, of a rural nymph ;"—and a smile passed over the features of the speaker, which Celia translated a sarcastic sneer.

" The real lover of nature," said our heroine, " can never be more than amused, by the futile imitations of art:—we may praise and encourage such efforts of genius as improve knowledge; but we return, with sincere pleasure, to that scene, which, ever varying, ever new, presents at once a lesson to mortality, and a motive for our gratitude."

" Infinitely just," said the Marchioness, bowing.—" She is advanced," she added, turning to Lady Townly, " past the age of universal homage.—Is not Townly given to lecturing, since your family circle has increased ?"

Lady Townly parried the effrontery of her friend, by reverting to the splendour of her Ladyship's recent ball.

" It was unique," said the Marchioness; " it bears the palm at present; but when once once you open your doors, all my invention must be exerted, or you will crush me into absolute insignificance."

Lady Townly apologized for having omitted to send a card to her Ladyship.—"I have a few friends this evening," said she; "but they are not those with whom you like to mix; that is, some very old country friends are the ostensible cause of the present evening meeting, and I shall be forced to give up a few items, in the way of decoration, in order to avoid the irony of Sir Peter, who has the happiest way of making one retract one's opinions, in all matters of taste."

"Who is Sir Peter?" asked the Marchioness.

"Sir Peter Berton," said Lady Townly.

"I will come, my dear Townly," said her Ladyship.—"There is something delightful in quizzing these country gentry; and their son, the elegant Berton, who is, without exception, the finest young man in England, he will be there, no doubt—it is so amusing to see the honest pair lamenting those advances which their children have made, inveighing against the times, and regretting that they did not make a fox-hunting 'Squire of a creature evidently born to fill the most enviable situation in life."

Celia sighed involuntarily;—it was a doubt with her whether he had not dishonoured his name, and bartered his eternal peace, from a too faithful adherence to the precepts of this erring, ill-judging world.

"Berton is going off," said Lord Quadrige, who had been deeply engaged in reading an authentic account of the Whip-Club's first spring meeting: "he was a very fine fellow;—but either he is cursedly poor, or sinking into obscurity, for I never hear him mentioned."

"How should you?" said the Marchioness; "your Club are at present the very point of attraction.—A pair of horses are now correct emblems of poverty, or a mind wholly without emulation."

Celia

Celia smiled—the Marchioness looked towards our heroine, with a glance of enquiry.

"Emulation is coeval with nature," said her Ladyship, laying an emphasis on the last word, that she purposed should convey an applicable retort to the rustic Celia.

Celia bowed, though their definition of the expression would have been perfectly distinct.

Lady Bab Blindon and Mr. Danbury were announced.

"I am expiring with fatigue," said Lady Bab, throwing herself into a chair.—"Conceive my courage—I have walked from Cardonnel's to this."

"How very imprudent!" said the Marchioness.—"My dear Blindon, you will spoil your ancles—nothing can be more injurious than such exertion."

Mr. Danbury, after addressing Celia with the profound humility of a lover, threw himself into an attitude of defence.—Lord Quadrige accepted the challenge, and an elegant specimen of the pugilistic art was displayed, for the amusement of the ladies.

"Admirable!" said the Marchioness, using her eye-glass;—"what science!".

Whether the mischief was intended, or that it was really accident, we cannot pretend to say, but my Lord, in an unfortunate moment, took an aim too near the cheek of his antagonist, and, woeful to relate! one of the martial whiskers of Mr. Danbury fell to the ground.

"Mon Dieu!" said the Marchioness.—Lady Townly unguardedly laughed aloud, while Lady Bab, clasping her hands, sat in rueful agitation. Celia, to whom all artificial aids, as applied to the person, were highly exceptionable, yet considered the present scene as one which must be painful to the demolished beau, owned that compassion inseparable from a good mind.—She turned from the ludicrous confusion of Danbury, who, seizing the fallen remnant of manly beauty, retired precipitately.—

Lord

Lord Quadrige endeavoured to look grave. Lady Bab cast an indignant glance at the rude gladiator, and turning her back on his Lordship, began a conversation, which she hoped would engage the attention of her auditors.

"What an enchanting effect that dying lamp had!" said her Ladyship, addressing the Marchioness.

"It was my own idea," said the Marchioness.

"Describe it," said Lady Townly.

The flattered fashionable complied.

"The bath in the interior apartment is considered a master-piece of architecture, so I contrived a small lambent sort of flame, that just made darkness visible, which, when combined with the refreshing coolness of the dripping water, was certainly very unique—it gained universal approbation."

"In the inner room I spy a winking lamp, that weakly strokes the ambient air, scarce kindling into light," said Lord Quadrige, Quadrige, with an air and attitude truly theatrical.

"Very poetic, inimitably applicable!" said the Marchioness.—"What a Proteus you are! When shall we see you fret your hour upon the stage again?"

"Our theatre," said my Lord, "has closed for this season;—the company are strolling in a sister kingdom."

"Your Romeo was the finest piece of acting I ever beheld," said Lady Townly.

"You do me infinite honour," said my Lord.—"Yet, assuredly, I may venture to say, that with Miss Delacour as my Juliet, I could exceed all my former attempts."

"No inducement could tempt me to an exhibition of the sort," said Celia, smiling.

"She speaks!—Oh! speak again, bright angel," said my Lord.

"Miss Delacour is a very primitive fair one," said Lady Townly, "or I would have persuaded Townly to let us get up a play this season; yet you may remember what a cruel negative he put upon my wishes, when I had

I had studied my character, and absolutely made my dress."

"It is probable you spared your character," thought the unfashionable Celia; yet she ventured no opinion.

"My dear Cinderella," said Lady Bab, in a whisper, to our heroine, "you will be generous, and, like the good protegée of the fairy, consider your sister, and help her to an etablissement."

Celia looked her surprise—"I do not comprehend you," said our heroine.

"You are a prude," said her Ladyship. "So you think I do not know that my brother is your slave, nor yet that he has imparted his tendresse to Sir Harry."

Celia trusted that the candid manner of her relation had convinced Mr. Danbury that she was unworthy of his consideration.

"What ineffable humility!" said Lady Bab.

"It is common honesty," said Celia;—and looking towards her sister with an expression of weariness, Lady Townly arose, and and assuring her dear friend the Marchioness that she should expect her in the evening, she nodded to Lady Bab and Lord Quadrige—"I shall see ye at night—adieu;" and followed by the tired Celia, she sought her carriage.

"That house always puts me out of humour," said her Ladyship; "it is like fairy land.—I will positively go to the North this summer, and contrive to fall sick, when, if I can but persuade Harry to sell or mortgage the old mansolem, as I always call it, I might hope to make a dash next season."

"What a noble emulation!" said Celia.—"You cannot be serious, Fanny; and, thank Heaven, Townly will not be so weak as to yield to your whims."

"Cruel Celia," said Lady Townly, "you have not a spark of emulation in your composition.—A husband! I verily believe your heart is made of adamant—you are absolutely repulsive; and, as my friend the Marchioness observes, time is stealing, Celia—Celia—you will let the golden moment pass, and then what will it matter that you once were young? Who cares for what we have been?—not a sentiment that you utter bears the naïvette of youth. You will regret it, believe me;—it is a lamentable character to support, to bear the gibes and jeers of every married girl, who blesses her good stars that she was prudent."

"It is my prudence, or rather my emulation," said Celia.—"I would not marry for the world's applause; and am emulous enough to hope that a pure conscience would meet favour, where perjury has been emphatically denounced."

Lady Townly warbled an Italian air;—and, as she descended from the carriage—"Not a word of the whisker," said she.

Celia smiled—and a reflection passed over her mind;—she wondered, if the defect had been one of nature, instead of art, whether her Ladyship would have been so forbearing. But though Lady Townly had asked the silence of her sister in this respect, spect, they had no sooner assembled at dinner, than she recorded the degrading tale, with all the well-known empressement of her disposition.

Sir Harry and Mr. Belford, though they smiled at the whimsical disaster, were severe in their censure of an adoption so unmanly.

"It is these effeminate follies that degrade the name of man," said the Baronet. "The original character of an Englishman has passed away.

"Such a medley of acquirements and fancies mix in the man of the present day, that one blushes to call such creatures countrymen.—A gladiator perfumed, bewigged, and be*whiskered;*—a cocher singing Italian songs, playing Romeo and the fool at the same time;—a soldier running races; and a parson to be found behind the scenes at the Opera House;—a merchant inventing classical designs for household furniture;—while the classical scholar is starving in his unfurnished garret;—poets writing grossierement sierement for the amusement of the ladies —and noblemen allowing their dedication, to the disgrace of their morals, and the certain dereliction of real taste, which never yet could be gratified by the impurities of genius."

"Yet we are told that the age is greatly improved," replied Belford;—"the arts are advanced to a degree unparalleled in this cold region.—This must undoubtedly be attributed to the ladies, who now, unconscious of the seasons' difference, think all penance to climate superfluous."

"The women!—By Heaven, Belford, the women are excusable in all their fancies. Where will you find a man who would appreciate them for innate worth? a pas seul, an Italian scena, may elect them to the favour of a modern man: yet I sometimes think, that if they were true to themselves, it might have a good effect; but I allow they have little encouragement to make the attempt."

"It were worth the trial," said Belford;

" for the universal vassalage of man is such, that they could not live their scorn ; though I believe it is possible for a very unfashionable man to die a mental death, under the caprice of his unconscious tyrant."

The last sentence was addressed at Celia, who, with her sister, had risen, and was leaving the dining-room. The cheeks of our heroine were suffused with crimson blushes; while Lady Townly, laying her hand on the shoulder of Mr. Belford, who was holding the door as they retired, declared he was as complex and eccentric a lover, as Miss Delacour, in all her search, could possibly hope to meet.

Mr. Belford closed the door; and as he pledged the sparkling beverage to the mistress of his heart—" Would to Heaven I dared hope as much !" said he.—What Sir Harry wished, he did not utter, for his hopes were by no means sanguine.

CHAP. II.

"Ye splendid fabrics, palaces, and towers,
Where dissipation leads the giddy hours,
Where pomp, disease, and knavery reside,
And folly bends the knee to wealthy pride,
Where luxury's purveyors learn to rise,
And worth, to want a prey, unfriended dies."

Our heroine had been in a degree initiated into the system which graces an assembled party, had heard all the flattery, hypocrisy, &c. &c. which is usual in society; but the preparations previous to their admittance, was a scene of which she could form no idea. It is happy for the uninformed, when they are permitted to extend their knowledge; for, if the thing be worthy their adoption, reason decides in its favour; and if it be only the perishable whim of the day, the mere dashing, fascinating gewgew of the moment, the rational creature owns the same reference, and rejects the illusive theory.

"Theory," says the paragraphed, smiling, distinguished fashionable, "do we not practise all the elegancies, invent a thousand luxuries? What do you expect of us?"

Nothing, absolutely nothing, my fair volunteers in the cause of folly, for you are not qualified to please me; nor do you please yourselves—it is all imagination. You mean to astonish, and you endeavour to do so; you make the attempt, and are outdone in the next hour. Thus you deserve not the name of practitioners—you are quacks, detected and exposed by every aspiring votary, who takes his or her diploma at the hands of folly, fashion, notoriety, or any other name by which you choose to distinguish your disease.

"Excessively well!" said Lady Townly, as she walked through the apartments; "very unique!—Horrible!" she screamed; "did you ever see anything so odious?"

Celia

Celia knew not where to look—her Ladyship rang the bell—"Send for half a dozen of the men from below," said she. The men hastened to obey her order. "Break that hideous monotony in the chairs," said her Ladyship, "it fatigues my eye." The men were active in effecting the confusion desired, while Celia sat a silent spectatress of the scene. "And those noveltics," said her Ladyship, "they are placed in pairs—how ridiculous! divorce them instantly; can any thing be so unfashionable!" Celia thought, and she allowed it to be natural, that the men found it difficult to hide the risibility which the commands of their Lady excited. "That will do," said Lady Townly. The men withdrew. "Heigho!" said this voluntary slave, "why did I hear of that provoking lamp?—but it is too late now."

"Is it possible that you can give a thought to a matter so insignificant?" said Celia.

"Yes, not only possible, but bona fide the case," said her Ladyship; "my eye is painfully correct—I see defects, where the vulgar would express strong admiration."

"But you never saw this wonderful lamp," said Celia; "thus it is your emulation, and not your eye, which is offended."

"You are very saucy," said Lady Townly; "it is my mind's eye that is wounded, for in idea I see that 'streaming light', so eloquently described by the Marchioness."

"There is a light, to which you are wilfully blind," said our heroine, "I mean reason. For shame, Fanny! shake off this insidious lethargy, nor send me from you hopeless, if not miserable. Did I not hear you declaim against servile imitation, and now you are lamenting that you have not the power to adopt a most egregious folly. The eloquence of the Marchioness appeared to me the most glaring absurdity I ever witnessed. Nay, forgive me, when I add, that the idea of making a bath conspicuous, appears at once ridiculous and voluptuous; here they they are more for ornament than use; and in those countries where their use is general, I must believe, (because the idea is soothing to my feelings), that whatever has been written to the contrary, a sort of sacredness of modesty is observed, consistent with the delicacy of the sex: it is not because one woman has thought proper to make herself eminently ridiculous, that you should follow her."

"My dear Celia," said Lady Townly, "you talk this matter vastly well, but you cannot convert me. If one lives in the world, one———" A loud rap interrupted her Ladyship. "What vulgarity!" she continued; "it is scarcely ten o'clock —the Bertons I will vouch."

"I hope so," said Celia, "for I should like to snatch a few minutes of sober conversation."

"Most willingly would I resign my share of the treat," said Lady Townly.—"Ah! my dear friends," she continued, rising, "this is kind—I had not promised myself so condescending a proof of your favour."

Celia felt uneasy while contemplating the features of her sister—they wore the most conciliating smile—it would have been impossible to detect the finished hypocrisy——and she sighed at the perfection of the deceptious system.

Sir Peter was remarking on the brilliancy of the rooms, when Sir Harry and Mr. Belford entered.

"We are early visitors," said Lady Berton; "but take into your consideration the simple fact—this is our first appearance at an evening party for the last fourteen years; and Berton has been teazing me these two hours, with the belief that Celia would have retired before we arrived."

"Yet you visit London every year," said Lady Townly; "how do you kill your evenings?"

"Our stay is always short," said Sir Peter; "we do not mix so as to gain the fashionable way of murdering the tyrant, and are forced to be content in our ignorance, and use him. Fanny," continued Sir Peter, "what would Aunt Mansfield think of these apartments? she has excellent natural taste, and would do justice to any invention that illustrates genius; yet I am not quite certain that she would not consider some of these decorations superfluous."

and

"She would be right," said Sir Harry; "they are truly ridiculous;" and he directed Sir Peter to observe the novelties dispersed through the rooms. "Their very name is an offence to common sense—but what will not amuse the grown children of this age!"

Lady Townly declared, "that though she should be convinced of their uselessness, they yet owned an infinite value, in the reflections and moral sentiments they induced from some of her friends."

"Berton, you deserve this," said Lady Berton; "Fanny is correcting your impertinent criticisms."

"They

"They delight me," said Lady Townly; "I would not glide down the stream unnoticed, for the world."

Sir Harry sighed, but made no reply.

The arrival of Lady Cardonnel, Lady Bab Blindon, and Mr. Danbury, changed the subject and the scene. The latter, whiskered à la Russe, seemed to have forgotten his recent humiliation.

Celia wondered at the effrontery of the buck, whose marked attention, as directed to herself, was particularly unpleasing.

As the circle encreased, our heroine contrived to get a seat next Lady Berton—"Come to me to-morrow," said her Ladyship, "we are going to George's box—he has promised to give us some delicious fruit."

Celia assented—it was impossible to refuse so simple a request, and the pleasure she always owned in the society of her old friends, was superior to all other of her London enjoyments.

Lady Berton had strolled with Celia through through the rooms, when Mr. Berton advanced—"I am deputed to deliver this to you," said he, holding a letter in his hand.

"For me?" said Celia.

"I give it unwillingly," said Berton, with an air of gallantry; "for, perhaps, it is what I ought to expect, but have not the courage to bear."

"You are a faithful messenger," said Celia, smiling, holding her hand for the letter.

Berton glanced over the superscription —"God of Heaven!" said he, and recovering himself suddenly, he added—"it is impossible!" and presenting the letter, he regarded Celia attentively.

Our heroine, who, in the instant of Berton's exclamation, had combined the probability of its being the expected epistle from Jessy, and that he was her destroyer, stood irresolute.

"How came this into your hands?" said Celia, as she discovered that it was from the wretched girl.

"Richard

"Richard asked me to convey it to you," replied Berton; "he said that Lady Townly would not permit him to appear up stairs to-night—and added, that he had been endeavouring to get one of the servants to take charge of it, but they were so busy they could not attend to him."

Celia put the unopened letter into her pocket, and was chatting with Lady Berton, when the Marchioness and Lord Quadrige joined them.

"How admirably Danbury bears the late découvrir!—he has infinite addressé," said her Ladyship.

"Nothing but a Lethean draught could do away the impression," said Celia, smiling.

"How immensely cruel!" said the Marchioness; "you must not be so severe. Consider, my dear Madam, the thing is usual, and really, I must say, the effect is very becoming."

Lord Quadrige, who was really a handsome manly figure, and proportionably vain, smiled graciously on Celia.

"Oh,

"Oh, there is Desmond!" said the Marchioness; "now for 'Much ado about Nothing.' Let us cut her. Quadrige, look over her head," and the Marchioness laughed loud, addressed a thousand questions to her party, and answered them herself. Lady Berton was amused by the scene. "Introduce me to your papa and mama," continued her voluble Ladyship, tapping Berton on the shoulder; "I will give their rustic principles such a shock, by the aid of a little badinage, that shall induce a moral lecture for the edification of the company."

Berton, amidst all his errors, retained the most perfect veneration for his parents. Celia blushed, while Lady Berton, who leaned on her arm, by a gentle pressure, forbade her to convince her Ladyship of her exact situation.

"Lead me to them," continued the Marchioness.

"Excuse me," said Berton, "they would detect your intention; I——"

"What an impertinent! Well, positively, ly, I know you fear me. Which is Sir Peter Berton?" said the Marchioness, attacking Belford and Sir Peter, who crossed their path.

"Sir Peter Berton, at your service," said Belford, introducing the Baronet.

The Marchioness blushed—"I am most excessively honoured," curtsying; "it is a happiness for which I have long sighed," said her Ladyship; "but these young men, my good Sir, have an immense dislike to their town friends meeting their rural relatives—it is a sort of error, into which the hilarity of youth could alone lead them, for surely nothing ought to be more soothing to the idlers of this giddy metropolis, than that they have a solace in reserve, to which their inexperience may resort, whenever Reason usurps her power."

"Their affection may and should be gratified, by a reflection so essential to a good mind," said Sir Peter, bowing with cool respect; "but, unless they carry in their bosoms a guard against deception, and a just sense of the value to be placed upon all that this town can bestow, their country cousins, like their offended Supernal Judge, will consider their offering as of little worth."

"Infinitely just, as much like an aspiring curé, in the hearing of a bishop, as any thing can possibly be," said her Ladyship, dragging her party onwards.

"Now for the mama—they are the trembling sensitive plants in these cases."

"I will answer for the mother in question," said Berton, with animation. "See how exactly you have guessed the truth —this is my mother," and he introduced the Marchioness.

"Ah, mon Dieu! what a cruel dilemma!"

"Take comfort, Madam," said Lady Berton; "your Ladyship will no doubt find a reserve, and for myself, I avow I am not without one."

"How eminently lenient!" said the Marchioness; "yet really, if you understood my character, you would discover that it is the delight I have in lowering these young men, whose vanities are so insufferable, that it is absolutely necessary we should lash them sometimes."

"The motive is excellent," said Lady Berton; "and for the effect, I shall ever remain a believer in your Ladyship's talent for badinage."

"You are very good," said the Marchioness, who, seeing Lady Cardonnel in earnest conversation with Bridoon, recollecting that she had a matter of moment to impart, gladly left her tired companions.

Berton felt as though he could have resigned the smiles of that world which he had been so sedulous to please, have resigned it for ever, and in the virtuous circle at Hadley, learned to estimate life, by employing it rationally; that he did not blend a system perfectly consonant with a heart in love, we would not pretend to say; and perhaps its impracticability made it more the object of his consideration.

"I am very angry with you," said Lady Bab

Bab Elindon, addressing Celia; "you are an ungrateful creature—not a moment of this evening has been given to me—it is immensely cruel, considering our projected relationship." Celia looked grave. "Nay, do not blush so childishly," continued Lady Bab; "all the town knows it—I pity you, Quadrige, but disappointment is the lot of mortals;" and with a sarcastic shrug, she quitted that friend whose society she had appeared to seek.

"And it is yours, and all those who think with you on this subject," thought Celia; yet she was not so uninformed in the motives of the fashionable Lady Bab, as not to perceive that it was done to make her conspicuous, and give strength to the pretensions of Danbury.

"Though you will not be my daughter," said Lady Berton, as she drew Celia on one side previous to her departure, "I am persuaded you will make no decision without consulting your good aunt."

"Never, my dear Madam," said Celia;

"the world is strangely disposed to speak of me—why, I cannot discover; but assuredly nothing can be further from my thoughts, than any engagement of the sort to which they allude."

"I thought so, my dear girl," said her Ladyship; "I must ever regret that our happiness is diminished, by your refusal of our erring yet not incorrigible boy; but assured as I am, that principle actuates every feeling of your mind, we do justice to your candour. Adieu," continued her Ladyship, "I shall expect you in the morning."

Celia promised to be punctual. "If my sister asks for me," said Celia to Mr. Belford, who had attended Lady Berton to her carriage, "whisper that I have retired for the night."

"Give one moment to me," said Belford; "I heard Lady Berton compliment you on your candour; extend it, and tell me how I have fallen under your displeasure."

"My displeasure!" said Celia, smiling, "what a term!"

"Be generous," said Belford; "I deserve it at your hands."

"My head achs," said Celia; "yet I will not recede from your enquiry, when I can with propriety reply to you; will that satisfy you?"

"It must," said Belford, "for I must believe you. God bless you, good-night!" and pressing her hand, with an impressive yet respectful manner, he waited only to obey the commands of his beloved Celia, and retired.

Our heroine drew the letter of Jessy from her pocket; her expectation was high, because her feelings were strongly interested in the fate of the sufferer; and the manner of Belford, so void of levity, so incapable of a conduct so flagrant, made her anxious to have her doubts removed. She broke the seal, but great was her disappointment, when only the few lines following met her eye:—

"DEAR MADAM,

"ALL my purposes are defeated; my cough has occasioned so great a weakness in my side, that I cannot bear the fatigue of writing; if I am better to-morrow, I have much to say, and am only anxious to assure you, that I am grateful for your kindness to the wretched

"JESSY."

"That sweet boy!" said Celia, as she gazed on the waved lines; "poor Jessy! yes, she is evidently dropping into the grave—why should not I go to her, and comfort her, assure her of my firm intent with regard to her child? she has avowed she is unfortunate, and abandoned by her seducer." The world rose on the imagination of Celia—"The world," said Celia, thought-thoughtfully—"the impertinent cheat!—Does not Lady Milner meet countenance from those who call themselves virtuous?—and she left an honourable husband, and an innocent family, and without a blush, mixes in society, as if a new name could regenerate her conscious error. Did I not see the husband of that shameless woman beaming on his intelligent countenance all the care, the sorrow, the sensibility, that should mark the penitent instead of the injured? I will see you, Jessy, not to-morrow morning, but in the evening—I will steal an hour, and visit your deserted abode, though a thousand fingers should be pointed at me—I feel I cannot be wrong in doing so, and I believe I have the power to give you some comfort."—With these feelings the benevolent Celia retired; Charity soothing her slumbers, by perfecting her hopes in the fair vision of a dream.

As our heroine at breakfast, next morning, made known her promise to Lady

Berton, her sister declared herself disposed to join the party sans ceremonie.—"There is nothing I enjoy so much as a dejeune—and there was such a palpable meanness in Lady Berton's being so sly, that I am half tempted to do my utmost to vex her."

Celia explained; she believed it was not to be a party—she was assured it was not. Lady Berton had merely asked her, because she knew that she liked to get out of the air of London as much as possible.

"Ah, now I recollect it is at Highgate," said her Ladyship; "I recant—positively I could not support the idea. Celia, you will have immense amusement—it is quite a London village—citizens' country-houses, no bigger than an egg-shell—monstrous verandas, enveloping the whole fronts of the mansions—flowers, placed in regular rows, like their ribbons and pins in their shops in town—and you will see the loaded stages, conveying the live lumber to breathe fresh air, that is daily impregnated with the fumes of tobacco whiffed from from their contemplative pipes during their evening reflections al fresco."

"There is an independence in their enjoyments," said Celia, "even admitting them to be exactly what you say, that places them above their superiors. In fashionable life there is not the most remote semblance of this boasted prerogative of the English character; they are slaves, asses, discontented, envious beings, applauding with one breath, and censuring in the next; and the hypocrisy, Fanny—I blush to reflect on all I have heard. Fashion, beyond a doubt, blinds her votaries, but unless she makes them deaf at the same time, they are the meanest class of beings under Heaven; for nothing can be more obvious, than that they smile in your face, and traduce you at the same moment."

"You are a dear truth-telling good girl," said Lady Townly; "but, Celia, you will never be a happy woman—that microscopic eye of yours is an enemy to content—you will not see things as they are— what you will be twenty years hence, I cannot conceive; and actually, as your 'search after a husband' appears to me hopeless, (because your fastidiousness disgusts the men worthy to be distinguished), I am anticipating that awful period, when, with your spectacles on your nose, and your voice changed to the owl-like shriek of antiquated maidenism, you shall be lecturing the poor damsels of that day, with the immorality of the men, and the astonishing indelicacy of the women."

"I need not wait that term to make my strictures applicable," said Celia; "the present times would afford ample topic for animadversion, but I am not so arrogant, I trust."

"What do you mean to do with your money?" said Lady Townly; "I really think it would be provident in me to court your favour, and get you to make your will in Rachel's behalf."

"She may very probably be my representative," said Celia; "at all events, it shall shall never be given for the purchase of a mail-coach, though made on the most superb model, nor yet to buy whiskers for any Englishman, who wishes to look like a bear; it shall never encrease the brutality of a pugilist, nor improve the false taste of an imaginary connoisseur. I would give it unhesitatingly to the man I loved, but the man I could love would not condescend to be my debtor."

"Love in a cottage!" said Lady Townly, laughing; "yes, my dear girl, Fate has made a gentlewoman of a very good sort of housewife, who would have owned more happiness in a dairy than the most splendid dome could bestow."

"You will not understand my feelings," said Celia, smiling; "yet I wish you did, for I think you would love me better."

"Forgive me," said Lady Townly, as she perceived the tears that stood in the eyes of our heroine; "I would not distress you for worlds, believe me, Celia—it is my affection that leads me to this gaité—

I wish

I wish to see you filling that rank in society, which your person and fortune may claim—I see all the young women seizing the golden moment, and I almost despair of your settling—it is a serious thing in London; and my vanity is wounded, for I had really hoped to see you fired with a noble emulation, instead of which you are imperiously indifferent to advances, which would be seized with appropriate gratitude by thousands; it will all be laid to me—either I have no influence in society, or your extreme rusticity will be the imputed causes. Consider how mortifying this will be."

"I will abridge your uneasiness, and the impertinence of a world, for which I entertain the most sovereign contempt, by retiring to Hadley.—I have already exceeded the proposed term of my visit," said Celia; "my aunt, from affection to you, has not pressed my return, yet I know she wishes for me."

"Not

"Not yet, Celia—no, positively you shall not go till the autumn."

Celia held no altercation, yet she resolved on acting for herself; and soon after taking leave of her sister, she proceeded to Lady Berton's.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

" 'Tis heaven-born Charity, benignant guest!
She comes, the mourner's drooping soul to cheer,
And gently wipe away the orphan's tear.

* * * * *

" I pity the man who can travel from Dan to Beersheba, and cry 'tis all barren; and so it is, and so is all the world to him who will not cultivate the sweets of it."

Now Celia, though wholly void of affected sentiment, saw beauties, where a common observer would have found little to admire. In her ride to Highgate, the snug retreats of those persons, whom her sister had ridiculed, were to her objects of grateful contemplation. " It speaks the happiness of a free constitution," thought Celia; " their enjoyment is proportionably more perfect, as it is drawn from their own industry.

dustry. Nor should their taste be decryed —the taste of the higher circles, as drawn from antiquity, and adopted without reflection, offers an assemblage to the eye by no means perfect."—Thus the villas of the citizens were to the unfashioned Celia, structures more worthy of respect than the most classical mansions that the 'usage of society' had distinguished.

"George will meet an agreeable surprise in your visit," said Lady Berton, as they approached the dwelling of Mr. Berton; "I did not apprize him of it, though, in truth, my dear Celia, our son is much changed; that flow of spirits, which used to grace his manner, and gratify our loves, (from the conviction that cheerfulness is the handmaid of virtue), is sadly diminished."

Sir Peter looked thoughtful—"That sentiment is conclusive," said he; "I fear George has forfeited his internal peace, and it is beyond the power of this delusive world world to give a lasting sunshine, where no virtual feeling aids the lulling anodyne."

"We must be lenient, my dear Berton," said her Ladyship; "I dare not think with you. Ah, there he is!" continued the fond mother, "he is looking out for us."

The carriage stopped at a small, but elegant villa, furnished according to the French manner—muslin shades, through which the jonquil draperies were visible.

"How good!" said Berton, as he discovered our heroine in the carriage; "I did not hope so much, nor ought I to have wished it here," he added, in a low voice, and pausing in the little court, which bloomed in front of the house.

Celia looked towards her companion; he seemed on the point of saying more; but again taking the hand of our heroine, he led her into the cottage.

"This is exactly the retirement of a fashionable man," said Sir Peter, regarding the apartments attentively; "all the newness ness of style, and the luxury of foreign importations; yet I admit that the tout ensemble is pleasing to the eye."

Lady Berton was profuse in her admiration of the decorations—"There is an air of coolness, of simplicity, throughout the whole, that really pleases me," said her Ladyship; "it looks as though a female hand had given the finishing touches to the scene."

Mr. Berton coloured, and the nectarine he was presenting to Celia fell from the plate.

"The facility with which houses are fitted now, my dear mother," said George, "is not more extraordinary than the minuteness they observe in every particular which relates to comfort. It is an advancement we have made from our intercourse with the French; and though I perceive my father is laughing at me, I cannot forbear adding, that I am decidedly in favour of all introductions in matters of taste, more especially especially where our case is so considerably improved."

Sir Peter gave full credence to the assertion of his son, yet, with persuasive irony, descanted on the consequences of placing too much to the account of ease.

The party strolled in the grounds, where Celia owned infinite delight; the plants were in exquisite order: and here again one might have imagined a female hand had been employed, for the flowers were blended, not only with taste, but sentiment. Our heroine regarded them with unusual interest—the nursery-grounds rose on her imagination, and the fading Jessy wrung a sigh from her bosom. She had taken a seat by Lady Berton, in a small recess, at the end of the garden, when a servant approached Mr. Berton, and announced a visitor—and in the next moment Mr. Belford appeared. He started on perceiving the ladies, and, without speaking, drew Berton on one side; they seemed in earnest nest conversation. Berton raised his hand to his forehead—he looked irresolute.

"Can you hesitate?" said Belford. A look of scorn was directed towards Mr. Berton, as he left him to his reflections, and joined the ladies.

Lady Berton arose—she saw an agitation in the manner of her son that alarmed her—"You have brought bad news to George, I fear," said she, and she fled to seek the cause. She took his hand—her eyes were tenderly fixed on his countenance, while her feelings, though silent, might have been appropriately illustrated by the immortal Homer.

"Why grieves my son? Thy anguish let me share, Reveal the cause, and trust a parent's care."

"I must leave you directly," said Berton; "I have an affair of moment to adjust. Make an apology to Celia—no, I will speak to her myself," he added; and advancing to the arbour, he was expressing his regrets at the necessity he was under of quitting them, when Celia, in raising her eyes to reply, saw the name of Jessy, written with a pencil on the trellis-work, and beneath that the lines subjoined—

"Thus, for your sake, I shun each human eye;
I bid the sweets of blooming youth adieu;
To die I languish, but I dread to die,
Lest my sad fate should nourish pangs for you."

An ashy paleness stole over the features of our heroine—conviction flashed on her mind—she was incapable of speech—Berton glanced towards the spot on which her eye had rested—the damning proof was before him, and, without attempting utterance, he fled precipitately. Lady Berton, with Sir Peter, were conversing at some distance. Mr. Belford, who was seated by Celia, looked embarrassed—he was too liberal to breathe a sentence that could depreciate the evidently-erring Berton, while the effect the discovery had made in the sensitive sitive mind of Celia alarmed his love, and at the same time disappointed his discernment.

"Was Berton, until this moment, the beloved of Celia?" thought the despairing Belford; "I would rather have believed, that her sense of virtue alone influences her present feelings."

"Mr. Belford," said Celia, extending her hand, "I have been in error; I have dishonoured your principles; the mistake took rise in such specious appearances, as would greatly justify my mistake. You will accept this explanation, and believe me when I say, I rejoice that I am thus undeceived."

"Most generous and amiable of women!" said Belford; "yet your clemency is dangerous. Forgive me, Celia; I could ask more of you--say, if the man whom your delicacy is pleased to approve, whom your candour has reinstated where he is most anxious to make himself acceptable, tell me, if you could bestow a heart on that man?"

"I believe that I ought to wish I could do so," said Celia, with impressive sweetness: "you have heard me termed insensible—you will unite in the sentiment, when I declare, that to consider you as a friend will ever be most gratifying to my feelings, but that I am unworthy of a more flattering distinction."

"Enough," said Belford, relinquishing the hand he had detained; "you are above the little art of giving pain; may you meet a heart as worthy of you, as devoted to your unaffected character, as he who, while he adores your candour, for your sake will live and die a lover!"

Celia attempted to reprove the fond despondency of her friend.

"It is my pride," said Belford; "men of my age are either the victims of personal charms, or eminently miserable, from the perfection of their adoration. Mine must must be of this sort; yet I would nor forego the delight of seeing you; I do not esteem you as a handsome woman, as one who, in accepting my hand, would make me the envy of my own sex. However flattered I might be, I should be, by your love, the simplicity of your character would be the unrivalled grace, the lasting charm, which made me your slave—may you meet one who will prize you for this! Should you do so, even I, yes I, Celia, would endeavour at beholding you the wife of another."

Celia, at this moment, arraigned her own discernment—"Is not this the very preference that my heart has ever imagined as the foundation of lasting love? I can abstract from the language of a lover that superlative mode of expression, with which even sincerity may embellish the distinction. Then why am I thus indifferent to the honourable passion of Belford?" said Celia, mentally. "I am an imaginary artist," sighed Celia; "the portrait lives in my fancy—I must erase the vivid shade, for, alas! the colouring is not in nature —and what am I, who thus dare to expect in a husband the realised vision of a romantic heart!" Again the pencilled lines in the trellis met her eye, and the form of Jessy flitted before her mental perception—"Here has she mourned the broken promises of man, and she dies the victim of his arts." Her purposed visit to the frail sufferer was, if possible, doubled in its interest, for she believed that Berton's known assiduities to herself had been the deep source of Jessy's recent sorrow.—"May this," thought Celia, "be the extent of that visitation with which thy moral error may be chastened!" Alas! to fall from virtue is a grievous failing; but she who humbles herself, and is single in her crime, conscience is to such a one a propitiation and a punishment.

The Baronet and his amiable partner, though disappointed by the departure of their their son, were too fondly attached to him, to account for it in a way at all applicable to the real state of things; yet that tenacious foresight, congenial to parental feelings, impressed them with a dread of something undivulged, some reservation, which their tenderness and uniform leniency made them justly consider their due.

Sir Peter, after ordering the carriage, drew Belford on one side, and, with unaffected solicitude, besought him to explain the cause of George's sudden departure. "Was it business, my dear Belford?" said Sir Peter.

Belford declared he believed it to be so —"in fact, I am assured it is," said Belford; "I consider it to be the adjustment of a will, which has been delayed for some time, and it happened that I was so fortunate as to know that George would regret his omission; and having a call to make at his chambers, I undertook to seek him; not finding him there, and considering the matter urgent, I followed hither. But I believe I should not have been so zealous, had I known you would have felt this temporary deprivation so seriously."

The Baronet was appeased; but Lady Berton, whose intelligent eyes followed Belford with an anxious penetration, could neither raise her spirits, or dismiss the idea, that he was endeavouring to deceive them.

How many, and simple, are the disappointments which fall in our path! how useless are all our dispositions of the time to come! Man plans, and Heaven erases the fabric of his imagination. We purpose to be happy to-morrow; to-morrow comes, and some unexpected casualty defeats our bliss: yet it is the obscurity of our fate that gives us even the shadow of happiness. "Who talks of Providence, of a directing fate, when speaking of the common purposes of life?" says the light-thinking creature of the day; "is it not degrading the Deity, to take him into our thoughts in the midst of our pleasure?—does he preside over our thoughtless hours?—can we, ought we to expect his presence in our every pursuit?" I answer yes—for where is he not? "In the midst of life, we are in death."

> "Death stalks behind thee, and each flying hour > Does some loose remnant of thy life devour:"

and he who has "numbered the stars," who considers "the lily of the field," the inanimate bounties of his hand, will he forsake the endowed image of himself?—the creature, born with reason, and consequently capable of reflection? It is the heresy of reason to reject so soothing a belief—it is the scepticism of an irreligious soul, that, wilfully blind to the present, leaves all to the reckoning of a distant day.

With distinct yet equally oppressed feelings, our little party returned to town; that tranquil pleasure for which they had made the journey, had been destroyed—the disappointment was trivial in itself, but the cause was variously translated by each.

Celia

Celia quitted her friends with a tender reluctance; she saw them uneasy, and possessing in her own bosom a fatal knowledge of what they only surmised, she in idea looked to that period, when their parental bosoms would be distended, by the conviction that their hopes in their only child were not only too sanguine, but altogether ill-founded.

On entering the drawing-room of Lady Townly, Celia found her sister surrounded by visitors—"My dear girl," said her Ladyship, "you look quite funereal; what has Sir Peter been saying? Come, tell us all—who was there?"

"Mr. Berton was called away," said Celia; "we had no party—Mr. Belford joined us."

"Happy Berton!" said Lord Quadrige, taking a seat by Celia; "his presence must, indeed, be of value to Miss Delacour, if his departure causes so visible a dejection."

Celia attempted to refute the charge, but but in vain; for Lady Townly, and her echo, Lady Cardonnel, took up the subject, and, according to the "usage of society," quizzed her with persevering effrontery.

"She is a very fine girl," said Sir Robert Vat, in a whisper to Lady Townly —"How long has she been in town?"

Her Ladyship replied; and Sir Robert continued eyeing her through his glass with fashionable ease.

"What a famous hit I got this morning!" said Sir Robert; "I was in the stable, giving directions to my valet d'écurie, when a Jew popped his nose in at the door. I saw he looked knowing—so, stepping on one side, I threw off my coat, and began rubbing away at the harness. 'Vat you vant?' says I, addressing the Israelite.

'I put you up to a good ting,' says he.

"I fell into the snare instantly, and Moses, looking sagacious, produced a small box, containing a number of gold pieces.

'De bucks have sported half-crowns and and shillings, but not one has tought of gold buttons like dese; dey are de doubloon; vat you tink—get your buck to buy dese, and I will give you profit.'

"I offered to examine the box, but he fought shy.

'I will not trust them out of my hands,' said Moses.'

'My master is a prince in his pay,' says I.

'Dat is de worst ting you could say,' said Moses; 'no, you tell dat honest Jew has de bargain, and he will be caught.'

"I threw one of the traces over the head of Moses, and entangling him in my snare, I avowed myself; for a moment, he was overcome by surprise, but recovering himself, he threw off, and I discovered he was scientific—we sparred for ten minutes—he shewed infinite skill, and I now learned that he was a pupil of Mendoza's."

"Excellent!" said Lady Cardonnel and Lady Townly in a breath; "what a fund of whimsicality you possess!"

Lord

Lord Quadrige declared "it was an admirable hoax!"

Celia was silent—it was to her a new trait of fashionable manners, but that it was in the least applicable or essential to a gentleman, she could not admit.

Sir Harry entered, and, after listening to a repetition of the elegant anecdote, he took a seat by our heroine—"Could you give up the search, and pause here?" said Sir Harry, smiling.

Celia, in a low voice, declared "it was an additional stumbling-block in the path of her preferment."

"You were speaking of blocks," said Lady Cardonnel, turning to Celia; "how do you like the Cavendish scratch?"

Celia begged an explanation.

"How imperiously indifferent you would seem," continued her Ladyship, "as if you had not discovered the alteration in the têtes of the men."

Celia looked as though a total change in this now desolate departément of the masculine culine structure was an alteration "devoutly to be wished."

"Then you do not perceive," resumed her Ladyship, "that the Roman contour is dismissed, and the hair now descends below the neck—I think it excessively becoming, and vastly youthful."

Celia replied by a bow—she had nothing to say on this important subject.

A servant announced Colonel Aubrey, and a venerable-looking soldier-like man, evidently infirm, entered the room. The bucks kept their seats. Sir Harry arose to meet his friend, while Lady Townly made a long face on one side, and as instantaneously smiled on the veteran Aubrey, and with one of her overwrought compliments, expressed her pleasure at seeing him.

The Colonel was lively and entertaining—he checked the giddy sallies of Lady Townly with pleasant irony—"I must be fashionable in a degree," said Aubrey, placing his spectacles on his nose, "for that that young lady is a stranger to me; yet I think I trace a likeness to Fanny Delacour." Sir Harry introduced our heroine. "Yes, just such a woman do I remember Lady Townly," resumed Aubrey. "Do you like London, Madam?" and he made an effort to cross the room, in order to take a seat near Celia. His footsteps failed—our heroine and Sir Harry ran to his assistance, and had seated him, with that respectful assiduity, so applicable, so soothing to the aged, ere the Colonel had the power of thanking them.

The little group looked on—a titter seemed to pervade the countenances of the leagued fashionables; while Celia, unmindful of her situation, wholly overpowered by the feelings that filled her bosom, exclaimed—

"'Twas impious then, so much was age revered,
For youth to keep his seat, when an old man appear'd."

No sooner had she closed the couplet, than than the blushes that stained her cheek spoke the timid shame of a retired mind.

Lord Quadrige started from his seat—"What enunciation!" said he; "how mellifluous! Siddons is not more flexible! By Heaven, you were born for tragedy!"

"Not for mock heroics," said the Colonel, taking the hand of Celia respectfully; "time was, my dear young Lady, when, with the gallantry of a soldier, I would have thanked you for this genuine sensibility; but though war, and our mutual enemy, Time, has weakened this bending frame, it is possible that my gratitude is worthy your acceptance, for it is unfeigned and appropriate."

Celia endeavoured, by an attention such as the age and prepossessing manners of her new acquaintance demanded, to prove at once the value she attached to his sentiments, and her own humility; she was ashamed at having betrayed so much resentment towards men who were comparative tive strangers; yet to witness a total disrespect towards a man like Colonel Aubrey, to see those touching claims to our care, our tenderness for age, to the unsophisticated mind of our heroine, was not only the passport to esteem, but the mirror for our contemplation; to see this, and be silent, was to acquiesce, where it would be derogatory to be classed.

"A good quotation has an excellent effect," said Sir Robert Vat; "my memory is treacherous—pray, Madam, may I ask your author?"

Celia apologized—she allowed that her feelings had led her astray, and she trusted the gentleman would impute her unguarded manner to the impulse of the moment.

"Miss Delacour was referring you to your school studies," said Colonel Aubrey, "an epoch obliterated from the recollection of a modern man. It is Juvenal who illustrates this nobly tender sentence; but the traces of the academic college are now subjugated in that of the veterinary theatre—bridles, bits, and territs, give place to intellectual resources; and in the men of the present day, we meet anything but the man of letters."

Lord Quadrige adduced a list of names, as refutations of the satire—"Our poetry, our plays, our periodical publications," said my Lord, "are not the latter the very phillipics which must gratify those sage moralists, whose prejudices for times past make them look on the illuminations of this age with a jaundiced eye?"

"Our illuminations are confined to that light which the introduction of Grecian lamps has bestowed," said the Colonel. "Of our poetry, with a few exceptions, I would not speak in the presence of ladies. The drama has miserably fallen—as proof of which; a modern play is not printed immediately, lest, being read, it should damp the ardour of public curiosity, and thus deprive the author of his nine nights. Yet I know not that this should be termed a proof of bad writing, or whether it is not a just conception of the present taste of the English, which is childishly prone to follow and admire whatever is new and ambiguous."

"Pardon me, my dear Sir," said Lady Cardonnel; "but, really, if we were to disregard all that is done for our amusement, should we not sink into that rough, unpolished state, that barbarism once attached to the English character? Have we not advanced in feminine graces?—reflect on the reign of Elizabeth, the beef-steak breakfasts, the coarse language of that rude age."

"It was nevertheless an intellectual period," said the Colonel; "nor are the instances adduced by your Ladyship of sufficient weight to stamp the character of those times. I grant that the personal graces of the women are more feminine than formerly; yet their beauties are by no means so natural; it is rather the imbecility than the worth of the sex that is now appreciated; and, though you shudder at the idea of an old English breakfast, the dejeune of this day, followed by a dinner devised by luxury, and devoured with epicurean goût, and not unfrequently succeeded by a three o'clock supper, I repeat, these frequent meals evince, that the ladies are by no means so delicate as they would wish to be considered."

Lady Townly defended the sex—she believed that the sustenance of a whole day was not equal to one meal of that period to which the Colonel alluded.

"What a famous scramble we had at the Argyle rooms the last night!" said Sir Robert Vat; "I made a neat manœuvre, and succeeded in getting my party to the best table."

"I never eat suppers," said Lord Quadrige, "but I like to look on; it is highly amusing to see the country gentry swallowing their surprise and their supper at the same time, for curse me if I believe they know what they are eating."

"It is an ignorance not confined to any sort of people," said Colonel Aubrey, "for the variety introduced at modern tables requires a diurnal translation."

"I know no house in which one dines so much at ease as Bandana's," said Sir Robert; "he has a bill of fare placed to every visitor—it is worthy of imitation—there is something vastly unique in the idea."

The Colonel and Sir Harry smiled—"Speaking of times past," said the latter, "it has often occurred to me, while contrasting characters, that there was something godlike in the men of those days: we may blame the impetuosity of an Essex, yet his valour and his misfortunes balance the irritable qualities of his disposition. The manly effusions of a Sidney evince that poetry is most delightful, when flowing from a virtuous mind. The wary policy of a Leicester is not unworthy of remembrance—in fact, numbers could be selected from the tombs, who might call a blush upon our cheeks. Would to Heaven it could excite emulation!"

"Yet this period is not destitute of ambition," said Lord Quadrige; "my dear Townly, you abstract yourself from that sphere in which the qualities of your sex emanate; your library is your sanctum sanctorum, and you prose over the ancients, till their musty maxims deranges your social feelings, and you enter into society like a cynical misanthrope."

"Exactly so," said Lady Townly; "you have pourtrayed Townly admirably, and he deceives himself, for he is naturally a social creature."

"But not a dissipated one," said Colonel Aubrey; "the distinction is clear, though rarely made. I smile to hear Quadrige speak of emulation," continued Aubrey, addressing the Peer; "I knew his father, fought by his side, and was once so happy as to save him from a personal danger. Could my services be of avail to his repre-representative, it might be in saving him from breaking his neck, as a rival coachman, or being his bottle-holder at a prize-fight. Are these the qualities that should attach to a title, such as you own? Forgive me, my Lord; but when I meet the sons of men, whose names yet live in the memory of their country, when I see young and active men wasting their lives in pursuits, not only useless but degrading, I blush for my country—I anticipate an awful termination of that glorious constitution, which, supported by her benefited family, would stand the test of time, and laugh her puerile enemies to scorn. The true end of life is,

> ——————"Still to employ
> The mind's brave ardour in heroic aims,
> Such as may raise us o'er the grovelling herd,
> And make us shine for ever, that is life."

"These are the embers of a martial flame," said my Lord, smiling. "I admire,

I estimate the zeal of a veteran such as Colonel Aubrey," bowing to the animated soldier; "but, my dear Sir, we cannot all be soldiers—and I fear, that the unlucky damp, just thrown on patronage and preferment, will tend rather to fill the civil list, than swell the number of English volunteers."

"I'm gone," said the Colonel, rising; "willing as I am to bow to female influence," and he glanced towards Celia, with an air of lively gallantry, "I feel all the pride of age, when I reflect that my commission is antediluvian," and followed by Sir Harry he withdrew.

"What a charming old man!" said Celia, as the door closed.

"He is most insufferably grotesque," said Lady Cardonnel; "if I had not feared that he would draw me into an argument that must have lengthened his visit, I should have had immense enjoyment in quizzing him."

"You

"You were wise in avoiding it," said Celia, "for I think he would have obliged you to ret eat."

"Miss Delacour is amiably condescending," said the Peer; "but, my dear Madam, if you persevere in standing forth as the champion of age, you will lose the homage of the young."

Celia was silent—yet Lady Townly, who read her thoughts, translated the intelligent smile on the features of her sister, as expressing a belief that she would be no loser in that case.

The party dropped off, and Celia, whose mind was intent on her evening visit, withdrew, to consider on the line she was to adopt.

It is not sufficient that we know what is right, but that we also practise what we know. Thus our heroine, though fixed in her purpose, was embarrassed as to the mode in which she should prosecute it —she could not make her sister a party in her feelings, for she would neither enter into into her sentiments, or unite in its necessity—to ask the use of the carriage was to avow some project. After some consideration, Celia resolved on making Patty her companion, and determining to seek the gardener, and learn the address of Jessy, with which she was as yet unacquainted; she relied on the purity of her intentions, and trusted the appearances, which any chance of discovery might elicit, would not injure her with those whom she valued. As Celia quitted the dining-parlour, she avowed herself disposed to walk.

"Not at this hour," said Lady Townly, "it is quite unfashionable; you will be mistaken for an emerging milliner, or one of the mid class gentry, who vex one by their exterior advances towards elegance."

"I must brave the public opinion," said Celia, smiling; "nor will the decision in either case pain me—I walk to please myself, and have much enjoyment in exercise."

Sir

Sir Harry offered to attend her.

Celia paused—a moment's reflection told her that he would be at once a proper escort, and a quiescent friend. She accepted his services, and departed on her errand of compassion.

Arrived at the grounds, she sought the gardener, who, while he answered to her enquiry, reminded her that he was now certain he was right, as to what he had said of the lady.

Celia repressed the explanation; and as she conducted Sir Harry to the dwelling of Jessy, she simply hinted that she was anxious to see an unhappy and suffering young woman.

The servant girl whom Celia had met with the child, answered the door; sending her card to the hopeless Jessy, she awaited the girl's return.

"My mistress will see you, Ma'am," said the girl.

Celia comprehended the emphasis—and Sir

Sir Harry being shewn into the parlour, Celia followed the servant up stairs.

On a sofa, whose whiteness was exceeded by the bleached cheeks of the fair creature who reclined on it, she beheld the desolate Jessy.

"How good!" said the poor sufferer; "but have you considered, Madam? did you come alone?"

Celia blushed—it was the humility of a sensitive heart, the conscious delicacy of a good mind.

"My brother is below," said Celia; "I heard you were ill, and I flattered myself that you understood my character—I am greatly interested in your happiness—tell me, in few words, how I can serve you?"

"Happiness!" said Jessy, with a sigh, "that is impossible! This poor little babe," and she threw aside the folds of her pelisse, which concealed the sleeping boy, "he will soon be an orphan."

"I will protect him," said Celia, rising; and and as she took the hand of the weeping mother, she cast herself on her knees by the side of the couch; "yes, be at peace on his account. I promise you solemnly —I promise you I will be his protector, his mother!"

"This is too much," said the suffocated Jessy, and her nerveless frame sunk in the bosom of Celia.

"Cruel, unfeeling Berton!" said Celia, as the unrestrained tears fell on the cheeks of the sufferer.

"Where is he?" said Jessy, reviving and looking around her.

"He is not here," said Celia; "compose yourself—give me your commands—I am all attention."

"I saw him to-day," said Jessy, "and he was kind; but it was too late."

Celia endeavoured, and with some success, to draw her from this most intense of all her feelings—she spoke with composure of death, but regretted she could not write to her parents. Celia besought her to dictate what she wished to communicate, and undertook the office of addressing her parents. She had folded her arm round the enfeebled invalid, and with all the tenderness of woman was supporting the form, and establishing the good resolves of a fallen sister, when a hasty footstep advanced, and in the next moment Belford was ushered in.

"Celia!" said the astonished Belford, "angelic, noble girl!"

"She is an angel!" said Jessy, extending her burning hand to the generous Belford.

Belford paused a moment—"Did you come alone?" said he, in a whisper.

Jessy caught the sentence—"Merciful Heaven!" said the humbled child of error, "the restriction is just; even I trembled for the fair name of this exalted woman—and do I live to own, that even charity to Jessy might injure the reputation of a virtuous woman?"

Her clasped hands were raised to Heaven, ven, her air was impassioned, yet despairing. Celia, melted into tears, was unable to offer consolation. Belford supplied her place; and as the exalted sentiments of a devout Christian were submitted to the penitent Jessy, as the inspiring ensamples of ever-flowing mercy were illustrated as comforts to the fading sufferer, Celia looked on Belford with an admiration so perfect, an esteem so softened, that had he known her feelings, that moment would have bound her to him for ever.

As the influence of that only peace to the penitent, "religious hope," stole to the heart of Jessy, her countenance became calm; the very lassitude of her frame seemed to bear testimony to the effect of piety on a mind not naturally vicious.

"Tell this boy his mother's story," said Jessy, as she gazed on the unconscious babe; "but teach him to love his father. How I have loved him, Heaven only knows —how vague!" she continued; "you do not know my sad story."

—how

"Let us not interrupt your present tranquillity," said Belford; "leave this to me —Miss Delacour already feels for your situation; she will not feel less, when she learns how greatly you were deceived."

"This," resumed Jessy, drawing a folded paper from her bosom, "has been duly executed; you will add to my many obligations," presenting it to Belford, "by occasionally seeing to its performance."

Belford promised faithfully to observe her injunctions. It was that which had called Berton from Highgate, as we have related, and was a provision made for the orphan boy.

The fatigue of the languid Jessy warned her interested friends.

"I will see you to-morrow," said Celia; "but if in the interim you recollect anything which will tend to your peace, if possible commit it to writing, that I

I may be perfectly informed of your wishes."

"I will, I will," said the sufferer, in a hurried voice; "Heaven bless you! I can say no more."

"Walton will call early in the morning," said Belford, as he arose to accompany our heroine; "be careful of yourself, and submit to his directions. Remember, that it is magnanimous to bear our lot, and endeavour to sustain our mortal term, by acquiescing to the aids that human wisdom has devised for our support."

"I will, I am guided by you, best and most generous of friends," said Jessy. "Once more, Heaven bless you!"

Celia retired, with a heart oppressed by sadness, telling Belford to apprize Sir Harry of her departure—she descended to the fore-court. The Baronet and Belford joined her; the former, though owning visible surprise in meeting Belford at this moment, discovered on the features of Celia so evident a melancholy, that, forbearing to enquire into the cause, he became the silent attendant of our heroine.

Belford, more than ever the lover of Celia, owned a melancholy delight in that recent sympathy of sentiment, which had permitted him to share in her feelings—his assiduity was of the most conciliating kind; and Sir Harry entered Portman-square, with a strong conviction that the friend of his youth was duly estimated by the woman his heart had selected.

"Now, Celia," said Lady Townly, "listen to the important fact," and she read from a fashionable morning print the paragraph following:—

"The lovely Miss Delacour, sister to the no less lovely Lady Townly, will shortly give her fair hand to Mr. Berton, only son and heir to the venerable Sir Peter Berton, Bart. of Berton Hall, Warwickshire."

"What a gross error!" said Celia; "are these things of consequence sufficient to be contradicted?—should they be noticed?"

"By

"By no means," said Sir Harry, "unless you desire it."

"I should be uneasy if it gained credit," said Celia, "yet am unwilling to be made conspicuous—act for me, Townly."

Mr. Belford advised the usual mode in these cases; "for, in truth, I consider the distinction in nowise flattering to Miss Delacour," he continued. "It would be matter of triumph to many, for Berton has stood high in the scale of fashion, and but for one reason, I would advise its remaining unnoticed."

Celia comprehended that reason, and deputed Belford to refute the paragraph on the next morning.

Lady Townly condemned the delicacy of her sister—"I declare to you, Celia, that I was anticipating the vexation it would cause to many of my friends," continued her Ladyship; "you are a silly girl, and will live to repent it."

"Never," said Belford: "your sister, my dear Lady Townly, is at once discerning and delicate—her judgment is correct, and though her decisions may sometimes give pain, the principles on which she acts are too obvious not to be duly appreciated."

"I see how it is—you are flattering her, Belford," said Lady Townly; "you have learned her weakness, and, by a pretended acquiescence in her sentiments, will, in time, adopt yourself so much to her taste, that you will sit down at last a contented Darby, with Joan by your side."

"Exonerate me from the foul part of the charge," said Belford, "and believe me as aspiring as your remark would imply; but I have no faith in my system, I can assure you: Celia—Miss Delacour, I mean, will in all cases do justice to my motives."

"Unhesitatingly," said Celia; "we understand each other," and she smiled with an affability that gave a momentary flush to the cheek of Belford.

"Adieu!" said this amiable man, as he withdrew, more deeply than ever impressed ed by the perfections of the woman for whom his heart owned the most tender affection.

Lady Townly soon after departed to a rout; and our heroine seized that moment to explain to Sir Harry her acquaintance with the unfortunate Jessy. The Baronet listened to the artless tale with silent admiration.

When Celia closed her little narrative—"How amiable!" said he, "how consistent with the softness of women, is this commiseration for an erring woman! Yet, my dear Celia, I rejoice that your usual prudence made me your escort in your recent visit. Your accidental meeting with Belford at the dwelling of this poor girl, if it had transpired, would have been translated variously — nay, your compassion for the dying Jessy herself would, if known, subject you to free animadversion."

"How perverted must the minds of women be!" said Celia; "I cannot believe it. Is not this deserted girl more worthy of countenance than any married woman who falls from honour, and in her ruin destroys a husband's happiness and her children's prospects? I declare to you, Townly, that, though imperfectly acquainted with the story of my late found friend, I am so assured of her penitence, so convinced that the climax of her error has been too great confidence in an accomplished seducer, that, if Heaven was pleased to spare her, I could love her as a sister—nay, it should be my study to support her in her principles—I would take her to Hadley, and my aunt, oh! how efficient would her mild eloquence prove to a mind like Jessy's! I must write to Hadley to-night," said Celia, "and apprize my aunt of my engagement for the little orphan; she will enter into my plans with avidity"—and she arose to prosecute her purpose.

"One word," said the Baronet; "has Belford avowed himself?"

"He has," said Celia; "and however incomprecomprehensible I may appear to you, I regret, most sincerely regret, that I am unworthy of so amiable a preference."

"Go, prove your heart, Celia," said Sir Harry, "and give me the happiness of calling Belford brother."

"It cannot be," said Celia; "he deserves an entire, a devoted heart, and mine is true to his worth, but incapable of a softer name than friendship."

"Then you are yet 'in Search of a Husband," said the Baronet, smiling.

"I believe Fanny's words were prophetic," replied our heroine; "I must be insensible. Adieu!" and kissing her hand to Sir Harry, she retired.

"What ideots we are!" said the Baronet, as he paced the room, in earnest meditation; "on what weak fabrics we build our hopes of happiness! Marriage, the most sacred of all earthly engagements, is, of all others, least considered; an intoxicating film shuts our eyes to the lasting charms that can alone render our bliss permanent, and we yield our faith, our honour, to the keeping of a mere beauty. Some worship gold, others swear to love a woman, from no other principle than that of having borne away the prize that has been generally sought. What a mockery! how profane are such sacrifices! Simplicity of character, the pure emanation of reason, is too tame, too retired, to claim the homage of man. We pant for notoriety, and we attain it—yes, assuredly we attain it," and a pang of self-accusation wrung his bosom, as he reflected that Lady Townly was visiting alone. "What is this but weakness?" continued the musing husband. "The woman, whom we follow as her shadow, while her lover, whose accents, when given to another, create the most painful sensations, this idolized being is no sooner our own, than we give her to the world, an offering to its never-sated gulf; and when our misery stares us in the face, we tax her with her falsehood, and wonder whence the mischief grew. It is man then, weak, irresolute man, who, with all his boasted courage, cannot face the imaginary despot, custom, and yields to etiquette what is due to honour.

CHAP. IV.

" If I lash vice, in general fiction,
Is't I apply, or self conviction ?

* * * * * * *

I no man call an ape or ass,
'Tis his own conscience holds the glass.
Thus void of all offence I write ;
Who claims the fable knows his right."

It was at Florence, I believe, that the celebrated society, called " Academia della Crusca," was instituted, the purpose of which, as is generally known, was for the advancement, or rather the purity of the Italian language ; they resolved to throw out, like bran, all words which were not good Tuscan. Now, if a system of this sort existed here, and its object was to go beyond the extirpation of that garble of the tongue, tongue, slang, a language which, though admitted in society, is proudly rejected by a few—if we were to step beyond this, I repeat, and black-ball such as make a blank rather than fill a place in society—courteous reader, I mean a space; your own discernment will determine why—in this case, how desolate would London be! while the court of Momus might rival even the new-fangled Jours de Cour of the Corsican;—and though we know not that his godship could parcel out kingdoms, and make principalities, the assumed titles of his votaries might be sufficient to keep up the laugh. Nay, he might appoint his slaves. What could be more appropriate, than to place the "Knight of the Brim," Sir Robert Vat, to the task of polishing those bells, to which his follies have kept time, for a Roman age at least; and a noble contention for that mask, which the jester wears, might give him a just idea of modern acquirements; they could fight for the gay deception, and thus prove their election to his his favour. I beg pardon of this very numerous family, and regret, with unfeigned concern, that it is impossible, in an octavo volume, to do justice to their many claims to pre-eminent distinction. I have seen and inhaled the freshness of the "Bucks' Boquets;" seen them start for Salt-Hill, with all the enthusiasm of real whips; witnessed the grievous disaster of one blade, who, in the moment of extatic hope, was obliged to have recourse to a rope, to aid his departure. The coincidence was odd; and I was musing on it, when a sympathetic whisper ran through the crowd.—"How provoking!" says one.—"How unlucky!" says another.—I asked the cause.—The father of one of the bucks had thought fit to die on that day.—Poor man, thought I, he has reached his goal.—"But he will join them on the next shew-day," said a tandem-driver at my elbow.—Alas! thought I, and may not he too be called? and what will it avail that he could guide the reins, if he was unable to put the bridle

on his imagination—if he was emulous to run a race daily exhibited by men bred to the vocation, and was unmindful of that race which is set before us? Short-sighted mortals that we are, we are ever preparing for fancied journies, and forgetting that destined and immutable one, from which neither riches, nor even youth, can exempt us: and he who guides the fleeting carriage in the career of fancy, rides guard in that which leads to his eternal doom.

Taking leave of this fashionable family, we will return to Celia, who had addressed her aunt on the subject of the orphan boy, and concluded her epistle by an intimation, that she should not remain much longer in London.

"I consider," said Celia, in the close of her letter, "that I have sacrificed enough in my present visit;—all my hopes in the stability of Fanny have vanished.—Oh that she would commit her child to our mutual care!—I have proposed the matter more than once, but she will not hear of it:—

Townly

Townly desires it; but he yields to her in this, as in every thing. Yet it is amazing to me," continued Celia, "that she should make such a point of this; for no mother sees more of her children than that which is mixed in her toilet duties (from which it were wise to seclude them), and half an hour spared from the general buzz, which ascends from the eating-room to the drawing-room, and spends itself in fashions, admiration of present exhibitions, and a little innocent scandal; and the young mimics acquire, in these occasional permissions, the ground-work of that character which is ultimately to lead them into and establish them in society. It will seem almost incredible to you, my dear Madam, that fathers of families are, with a few exceptions, the leading men of the day. I have never yet seen a man affectionately interested in his treasures:—a few insignificant questions have reached my ear—such as—'Well, what did Monsieur D. say to-day? Your carriage is improved. Have you studied that chromatic?—Remember you must excel Lady Maria P———, or I shall be disappointed.'—And one or two have amused me, by their anxiety to have their children acquainted with ancient history, and have anticipated perfection in those intellects, which, by a romantic study of heroic deeds, has induced them, with no less vanity than misapplication of time, to enact scenes that true taste alone could illustrate. Excepting one amiable and enlightened woman, I have not heard religious knowledge termed as of any importance; and her family are by no means so accomplished as others with whom I have mixed; yet some traits of unaffected feeling, some deeds effectual, yet unostentatious, have convinced me that there is no foundation for happiness, but in the mind which is modelled on those precepts which were written for our learning."

you

Though Miss Delacour's letter entered no farther on this subject, we cannot forbear bear a little animadversion. The present age, with a disdain that accompanies superior intellect, justly deride precepts and examples;—they strike out something new. "There have been many good sort of women, obedient wives, and moral mothers," says the mother of the present day; "but the times are changed. Can we possibly give up our mornings to our children?—Must we not receive our friends, and leave our cards, from one to six?—Well, then, can we mix in society, without devoting some time to the toilet? We dine, either at home in company, or with some one of our dear friends. Parties succeed, and tired nature seeks the wonted restorative—we sleep—and day again dawns on us"—aye, and mid-day too, ye might add.—The sun has set upon a period of your misapplied talents, and it rises upon your entranced faculties; but all the talents, or rather that class of the rational animal creation, called man—how is his time wasted?—The statement will come into most narrow limits—he gives his name to a woman—he supports her establishment—sometimes without public contributions;—he meets her in the Park or Bond-street—hears of her at the console tables—owns all the pusillanimity of a wilful coward, when very superior notice levels her with the lowest of the erring, and contentedly wears those honours which real courage would not only disown, but resent. Does it require discernment to trace these evils to their source? Assuredly not.

We talk of antiquity, and pretend to a taste for ancient reliques; but the character must be new.—We attempt not to imitate the pious patience of a Penelope, the matron graces of a Cornelia, the feminine tenderness of Andromache, nor the magnanimous intellect of a Grey, a Russel, or a Pembroke. Our moral emulation is truly modern; and we would sooner follow a ——, from assignations in Kensington Gardens, to a divorce at the hands of human laws, than be found in the simple path of duty, supported by Christianity, and encouraged by that hope which sets all earthly matters at nought.

It will appear to a fashionable reader (if any such glance over these pages) that this is a most antique, if not a most impertinent digression.—If they feel very sore, the motto to our chapter is their mirror;—if not, they are lenient, and I thank them.

Another morning had dawned on Celia; it drew from her mortal term, but it could not abridge her eternal confidence; for it was destined to the performance of her duty.

Her recent interview with Jessy was yet fresh in her memory; and though the countenance and support of Sir Harry and Belford were efficient, in themselves, to shield her from censure, in that interest which she yet purposed to prosecute, with regard to the fair unfortunate, it was the wish of Celia to take a female opinion on the subject.—Lady Berton might, and would take a lively share in her feelings;

but

but our heroine could not resolve on distending her maternal heart, by exhibiting her son in his true character. Mrs. Welgrave occurred to Celia, and she resolved on seeking her counsel, and asking her company, in the visit she intended to make this morning.

She had arranged her plan, when Mr. Belford was announced. The mind which is actuated by pure principles, that owns no sinister motive, is unguarded, and liable to generous error. Belford felt the full force of this, as Celia, with ingenuous confidence, asked him to attend her to Devonshire-place.

They had descended the steps, and were proceeding on their way, when Mr. Berton joined them:—he was profusely eloquent in his regrets, at having been drawn from them the preceding day. Celia was replying, with a moderate, yet virtuous dignity, when an elderly man seized the arm of Berton, and, in a tone of impressive agony, demanded his child.

"Give her to me," said the old man, with proud authority.—"You have murdered her mother, but I am spared to accuse you."

Berton stood transfixed for a moment.—"He is deranged," said he.—Recovering himself, and turning to the hoary-headed stranger, he added—"My friend, I will attend you;" and he motioned the old man to retire with him.

"Friend!" said the stranger disdainfully, "I scorn the appellation.—"Lady Townly lives near this," he continued, addressing Celia.—"Tell me, Madam, does Miss Delacour reside with her?"

"My name is Delacour," said Celia.

"Then you are the honourable victim of this libertine," said the stranger.

"Heaven forbid!" said Celia.—"No, my good Sir, you are deceived."

"I must, I will believe you," said the old man:—"but my child, perhaps she perishes—where is she?"

Celia

Celia looked towards Belford—the glance was intelligent.

"Allow me to offer what consolation I can," said Belford.—"Her name?"

"Jessy Collins," said the stranger, standing in an attitude of fixed attention.

Berton grasped the hand of the stranger. "I will lead you to her," said he.—"This moment shall witness our union—go with me."

"Vile dissembler!" said the agitated old man, releasing himself from his importunate hold—"Begone! I loath you."

Berton obeyed the scornful mandate, and Celia, with a presence of mind which her hopelessness in the fate of Jessy induced, besought Belford to get a hack, and proceed to the dwelling of the unhappy girl.

The coach was procured, and our heroine, now wholly occupied in devising some gentle means of apprising Jessy of this unexpected bliss, was seated with the wretched father and Belford.—No consideration, as to the propriety of that part she was taking, entered her mind. It was agreeable to feeling, no doubt, but it was contrary to the custom of society;—"yet the very surprise," said Celia, mentally, "if unguardedly betrayed, might waft her fleeting spirit, ere she could hear her father bless her.—A woman, in such a case, will act best."

It was not vanity, my fair readers, which impelled this belief; it was the natural feeling of a woman—of a woman true to herself—a creature who, duly appreciating her rank in creation, felt that offices of gentleness, of sympathy, were her peculiar attributes—and she fled, with all the humility of virtue, to aid the penitent, enhance her hopes, and hide her conscious blushes in her bosom.

Arrived at the dwelling of this child of sorrow, Celia ascended to the sick apartment; she entered lightly, accompanied by the servant. The unconscious Jessy was in a deep slumber.—Celia watched over her couch some minutes; and, as she beheld the pallid features of the wasted invalid, she almost doubted that she could bear the blissful surprise.

At length, after a deep sigh, she awoke. Her eyes, no longer beaming with expression, seemed too weak to meet the partial light that was admitted through the window shades. Her cold and nerveless hand had felt the impression of a genuine sensibility, ere her feeble voice found utterance.

"What a dream!" said Jessy, as she held the hand of our heroine.

"Was it soothing?" asked Celia.

"I was forgiven," said the languid sufferer.

"You are forgiven," said Celia;—"for God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins. He bringeth into the way of truth all such as have erred, and are deceived."

"The comfort of such a friend, at this hour!" said Jessy.—"I cannot write, nor say to you all I wish.—Mr. Belford will do this; but you will soften the truth to my——."

Celia interrupted the exhausted sufferer, and, with prudential caution, unfolded the interesting fact.

"My father!" said the enraptured saint —"Oh, my father!" and she raised herself with a strength almost supernatural.—"Where is he?"

The venerable parent broke from the restraining arm of Belford.

> "With eager step to her he flew,
> And caught her in his arms,
> But found, alas! an ashy hue
> Was settled o'er her charms."

If the errors of Jessy were deep, her early fate, and the penitence which marked that close, might even, from the bosom encircled by the sacred rays of chastity, claim pity and esteem—and it was accorded; for Celia, whose warm heart expanded to the admission admission of hope, was cast from the glimmering beam, as she beheld the inanimate form of Jessy resting on the bosom of her father. In vain the old man besought her to look upon him; she spoke not; her eyes, fixed in unmeaning stillness, yet, in their last effort, had beamed a duteous expression; she heard her pardon, and she bore the grateful blessing to her God. The awful truth was soon evident—and now the living claimed the care of Celia; for Collins, not prepared for so sudden a shock, became frantic.

"She was the pride of my heart," said the old man, as he placed her marble hands in his bosom.—"Jessy, my beloved Jessy, speak to me.—We will go together, my child.—She wont believe me," he continued.—"I have been severe—I should have sought her."

Belford interposed—he besought him to be calm.—"She is happy," said Belford.—"Look on her features—how serene! you have effected this;—she has breathed her last last in those arms from which she considered herself an alien. Let this comfort you."

At this moment the orphan boy appeared;—he approached the couch—Celia caught the child to her heart.—"Dear infant," said Celia, "you are mine—from this hour you are mine;" and overpowered by emotion, she would have fallen to the ground, had not Belford supported her.

"We must go," said Belford.—"My beloved, my compassionate Celia, I cannot allow you to remain."

"Think for me," said our heroine, as, led by her attached friend, she descended to the coach, yet in waiting.

Belford placed her in the vehicle, and returning to the disconsolate father, apprised him that he would see him in an hour; then joining Celia, proceeded to Portman-square. That active benevolence, which had borne our heroine through the scene we have depicted, gave place to the most depressing feelings, now that the necessity cessity for action had ceased. Belford was at one moment condemning himself for having allowed her to be thus mentally distressed, and, in the next, applauding that divine sensibility which thus exalted her above woman.

"Celia," said the adoring Belford, "why did I ever see you? Woman, loveliest of all created beings, why are ye not, in sentiment as in nature, one great family?"

"Be my friend," said Celia, giving her hand to Belford.—"To you I confide the mode of conveying the child to me, as soon as possible;—see the good old man, and assist him in his mournful office.—Do more for me," continued Celia;—"explain as much as is necessary to my sister and Townly, and spare me all conversation on the subject at present."

Belford undertook her commands with a melancholy pleasure, and our heroine sought refuge in her chamber.

Sir Harry, who was alone, disdained not to shed the tear of pity for the youthful victim; victim; while his unfeigned admiration of the conduct of Celia at once evinced his affection for her, and increased that of the generous Belford. Lady Townly was visiting; nor when she heard the tender tale, did she elicit any of those semblances so graceful in her sex. She was alarmed, lest the world should talk on the subject. It was a most unusual interference in a woman of rank, she believed;—she was assured her sister meant well; but she could not understand how it was at all necessary that she should take interest in the concerns of a stranger, and that stranger an unfortunate unmarried woman. The Baronet, disgusted by the callosity of her Ladyship's sentiments, used no argument to convince her; and our heroine, unfitted for society, remained in her room during the remainder of the day.

There is a positiveness in age, which is not ill termed vanity; but, as the title-page of this book setteth forth, the author is an antique. Excuse her garrulity, generous reader; reader; she knows, for she has experienced the "human misery," that episodes are very intrusive things; but as it is in the power, and at the pleasure of her readers, to pass them by, she cannot resist saying a little more of Jessy.

Mr. Berton, as has been said, was bred to the law: it was in a circuit he made with the judge, in a northern county, that the innocent Jessy came in his path. The period of the assizes (though Heaven knows their purport is diametrically opposite to gaiety) always occasions a species of cheerfulness, a relaxation from business, that not unfrequently trains victims for a coming term.

Jessy Collins was the youngest of two children; their parents were in that happy rank of life, moderate independance; they knew how far their wishes might stray; and their wants were, from habit. al principle, strictly within its limits. Mr. Collins had been in the navy, in his youth; but wounds, and a disgust to the service, caused him to resign resign the smiling deep, and, on a small farm, seek comfort and repose. Their elder child, a son, had, from infancy, evinced much volatility of disposition;—various were the resolves he had made, as to the profession he could like; he spurned the idea of a rural life;—the sea was his aversion:—in fact, he wished to be a gentleman; but this, beside the uselessness of the calling, was beyond the means of his father. Thus he grew up a rustic idler, just learned enough to be the companion of the 'Squire and his fox-hunting companions, and sufficiently quiescent in his principles to be indifferent to the numberless difficulties in which his extravagance plunged his family. Often did the fond mother disguise the painful truth, and as often administer to his follies, by supplying his imaginary wants.

Jessy, to whom an useful, and somewhat ornamental education had been given, was, at the age of seventeen, admitted as an assistant in the seminary from which her little hoard of knowledge had been drawn. It was more in conformity with their circumstances than their wishes, that they parted with their daughter; but she was happy, and esteemed; and the vacations were periods to which the anxious parents ever looked, with delight and pride:—they were yet independant, though the dissipation of William had diminished their comforts. Jessy had quitted the school for a few days—for it was the gala season, the assizes.

William, enchanted with the variety introduced by the egress and regress of new faces, mixed in the circle;—he had dined at the Town Hall, and, by the vivacity of his manners, attracted the notice of Berton. They met at the 'Squire's dinner. Intoxicated by the notice of so elegant a man, he was ashamed to avow who he was. Chance, however, elucidated the fact; for Jessy, with her father, met the aspiring William, in company with his new friend.

Berton was charmed by the appearance of

of the artless Jessy, and, with ill-concealed vexation, bore the marked indifference of Mr. Collins, who neither seemed to estimate his rank, nor desire his acquaintance. Thus he took a professional revenge; he led William into excesses; and one night's play made him a bankrupt in honour, and a debtor to his new friend.

Berton treated the affair as a trifle; but William, not wholly destitute of pride, resolved on throwing himself on the clemency of his father. He had beside a new object in view;—he wished to go to London, and Mr. Berton had half promised to use his interest with a man in power, in order to obtain him a place:—but when the unhappy father was apprised of the fact, the hopes of William vanished;—his whole property could scarce cover the demand.—With a conscious pride, the venerable parent addressed the man of law;—he submitted his proposals of liquidating the debt by installments, and awaited the reply with inconceivable anxiety.

It

It was the moment for a generous mind to shew itself; and it was equally the golden moment for a speculative libertine. Berton was the latter: he fled to the farm; and while, with an appearance of exalted sentiment, he disowned the paltry remuneration, he so effectually blinded the admiring couple, that they gazed on him as a prodigy. William was now the sworn friend of Berton; and Jessy, what was she? the silent adorer of the generous, the accomplished Berton, an adept in whatever system he prosecuted. The wily seducer betrayed not his passion, till he saw his power over the innocent girl; and then, with well-feigned regrets, he cursed his stars, that had led him to contemplate a woman, who, while she made his misery, was cruelly indifferent to his anguish.

Jessy believed, when she expressed her gratitude to the generous friend of her brother, that her language was appropriate; but when he asked her for a softer sentiment, she wished she dared reply to him. He dissipated her humility—for he meant to humble her; therefore was it fit he should lead her from herself. He now wished to get rid of William, and, with all the eloquence he so well knew how to apply, he painted a soldier's life in colours so glowing, that the infatuated youth swallowed the bait, and, with letters of introduction, quitted the scene of his childhood. When a man is both plaintiff and defendant in a cause, it would be strange if he lost his suit; at least the juror who judges in these cases is not suborned. Nay, it has been observed, that the interregnum, in some cases, is perfectly distinct from the law's delay, which leaves the suit at issue; yet am I firmly of opinion, that there is a silent arbitrament in such cases, and a day of justice set apart for making the verdict known.

Be that as it may, William attained his object, and bore the colours of an English regiment to the theatre of war. Berton, like a skilful general, withdrew for awhile; he

he knew his interest in the citadel; he returned; and while he avowed his passion undiminished, he represented his parents as inflexible. Jessy had quitted her situation in the school;—she was now the comfort of her parents.

It is grateful to speak of woman in her lustre, for she was born to diffuse happiness, and temporise the rude nature of man, who would be savage without her; but it is lamentable to speak of her as the blighted floweret of the garden, the plant torn from the cherished path of innocence, and doomed to sorrow by that polished savage, man. Yet so it was:—confiding, implicitly confiding in the man who had appeared, in more instances than one, the most disinterested and generous of friends, she, in an evil hour, quitted the fostering arms of parental affection, for those of her accomplished betrayer.

Neither time nor distance could still the warnings of ever-wakeful Conscience;—she

"Our dawning purposes of heart explores;
See, from behind her secret stand,
The sly informer minutes ev'ry fault,
And her dread diary with horror fills."

The villa at Highgate was selected as a retreat for the dishonoured Jessy. Here, if she knew a tranquil moment, it was when the insidious Berton invented fairy promises of better days—of days when, sanctioned by his parents' approval, he should lead her from her unworthy osbcurity.

Days, weeks, and months, stole on. She was a mother, without a mother's sacred title. To be brief, near three weeks had elapsed—Love, though suffering, is prone to belief—In unlawful love, it is a cobweb veil, which we want courage to remove.—In that love which Heaven approves, the deceit is transient—for virtue is proudly daring.

Jessy felt she had fallen—that she was not destined to wear the name of wife;—and her secret grief soon effected a visible change in her person:—the death of William liam had reached her ear, through the public prints.—Home rose on her imagination —who would console her wretched parents? —yet she had not power either to quit the man she loved, or meet her deceived parents. Hitherto the attention of Berton had been such as is usual in these cases;—that is, he passed much of his time with her—was liberal in all his dispositions for her—was fond of his child, and called the villa his home. It was by mere chance that Belford surprised Berton, at his favourite retreat. No elucidation was necessary with the discerning Belford.—Jessy had never seen a stranger, till that moment;—and the timid shame of her manner spoke forcibly to the heart of Belford:—he questioned the gay seducer. Berton, now secure in his prize, was partially candid.—Belford saw no reason why he should hesitate to give his name to the woman whom his arts had destroyed. The counsellor laughed at the idea;—he was too well schooled in the higher courts to feel the necessity of so degrading a step, and from this moment Belford ceased to be his friend.

The arrival of Celia caused a revolution in the heart of Berton; and he now owned, or believed he owned, a sincere passion.—The villa was neglected; or if he did visit it, he was abstracted and uneasy. The furniture displeased him—the child was troublesome—and Jessy was no longer pleasing.—He was offended by her tears; nor could he possibly imagine what cause she had to grieve. Berton was blinded by his new passion; but the mental perception of Jessy was quickened, by her isolated situation. The dreadful truth rushed on her mind;—through her servant, she heard that Sir Peter and Lady Berton were in London, and that a young lady, on a visit to them, was talked of, as the intended wife of her betrayer. George, alarmed at his mother's avowed intention of visiting the villa, by a stratagem removed his victim to a lodging in the New Road, where, excepting in the punctuality of his remittances, he was rarely visible. The health of the wretched girl repressed those exertions, which her returning sense of virtue impelled;—she could not work—nor could she have found countenance, had she made the attempt—it is only the splendid child of error, who is tolerated in this era of glowing intellect.

Jessy was hastening to that "bourne from which no traveller returns;"—her ill-fated passion yet gnawed at her heart;—in a fit of despair, she addressed her first anonymous billet to Miss Delacour, on the morning that Celia saw Belford alight from the hackney-coach. He had unexpectedly discovered the abandoned girl—he had won her confidence, by the generous sympathy of his manner; and those words which met the ear of Celia, were the concluding wishes of this amiable being, who had been earnest in persuading the sufferer to quit the protection of her seducer, and allow him to ask the qualified support of a lady, whom he named as the most amiable of her sex. The female in question was Mrs. Welgrave.

Jessy rejected the interposition; she had no faith that any virtuous woman would mingle her tears with the penitent child of credulity;—she lived to yield this opinion, for one gentle, amiable woman not only ministered to her griefs, but spoke peace to her bosom—encouraged her humbled soul to seek comfort from that source whence only true comfort is to be found—who tranquillized her earthly anxiety, by becoming the guardian of her child; that woman was Celia.

What a catalogue of woe may be brought within the compass of a few pages!—for it is not necessary to illustrate the thousand pangs that agitate the consciously chastened heart;—the attempt would be difficult:—many would turn from the soul-harrowing tale; while those who possess sensibility sensibility will imagine what language would imperfectly convey.—Sympathy, charity, will sketch the portrait.

Thus have we brought the tale of Jessy to its close.

What can be offered in extenuation for Berton? The world, that is, the fashionable world, would qualify the glaring immorality.

"Men of rank (and of such I speak), if wrong, can scarce avoid sinning beyond themselves. How pestilential their example falls on the lower world, which, under the welcome force of such illustrious authority, turn dissolute."

"Great men in the wrong, are powerful engines of mischief, and, like bursting bombs, destroy themselves, and all around them." YOUNG ON PLEASURE.

If we look to the stations of men, in all trivial points, why is it that the exact state of their morals is beneath our regard? The very antiquity of the system should exalt it in the eyes of this generation; but I will venture to affirm, that the women in "search

"search of husbands," never cast a thought on this most essential of all considerations.

"Shame on the world," on the fair arbiters of man's terrestrial happiness.

> "Were you, ye fair, but cautious whom you trust, > Would you but think how seldom fools are just,"

your fates in this life might be eminently happy;—nay, more, the "hoary tyrant," who levelled you with the dust, would snatch the precious relique (your spotless fame), nor suffer cold oblivion to steep those deeds, whose record are a nation's pride.

I am not a democrat, courteous reader; I desire not the destruction of the "red book;" but I blush in idea, and anticipate the stained pages of that "annual red book," which tells of genealogy, and marriages, and divorces.—What a history of the times is thus illustriously transmitted to posterity!

"The counsellor, the elegant Berton,"

says the impatient reader, " can you estimate such men ?"

" The fair, 'tis true, by genius should be won,
As flow'rs unfold their beauties to the sun ;
And yet, in female scales, a fop outweighs,
And wit must wear the willow and the bays.
Nought shines so bright in vain Liberia's eye,
As riot, impudence, and perfidy."

" For him, as yet unchang'd, she spreads her charms."

Berton, as has been amply shewn, deserved the favour of such women. Few of his associates knew Jessy, or her story.—Thus the man who attended a judge, for the express purpose of executing and enforcing those laws, the boasted pride of his country, broke through all laws, human and divine, plunged an adoring woman, and a virtuous family, in infamy, and remained at large. I deny it—he was fettered ;—but the chains had not yet entered into his soul.—One pang, one excruciating pang, reached his heart. When the death of of Jessy was announced, how appropriate are the lines of that eloquently tender poet, the simple Goldsmith!

"When lovely woman stoops to folly,
And finds, too late, that men betray,
What charm can soothe her melancholy,
What art can wash her guilt away?
The only art her guilt to cover,
To hide her shame from every eye,
To bring repentance to her lover,
And wring his bosom—is to die."

If the part taken by our heroine appears censurable, we cannot help it;—she had heard of divorced wives being seen in some societies, and of pining Magdalens dying unpitied, lost, for want of care.

"The first shall never be my companions," said Celia; "the latter claim my compassion—for they are unhappy."

"Charity, decent, modest, easy, kind,
Softens the rough, and rears the abject mind;
Knows with just reins, and gentle hand, to guide,
Betwixt vile shame, and arbitrary pride:

Not

Not soon provoked, she easily forgives,
And much she suffers, as she much believes.
Soft peace she brings; wherever she resides,
She builds our quiet, as she forms our lives;
Lays the rough paths of peevish nature even,
And opens in each heart a little Heaven."

It is by no means incompatible with youth to be cheerful and wise. I believe, at the same time, it is possible to be lenient to the follies of the thoughtless, without renouncing our own stability; and, above all, I would draw a line betwixt the gloomy arrogance of a superstitious faith, and that mild essence of perfection, revealed religion. There is nothing austere in charity, in mercy—it was accorded with a tender regard for our weak capacities.—The most exalted of those miracles to which our grateful hearts can refer, were elicited in the most simple, yet impressive manner. We are asked, and tenderly admonished to believe. Be it ours not to tempt a rebuke, by turning from the path before us—but let us equally avoid the error ror of presumption—condemn none, for vanity blinds us. Our perceptions are various. One eye sees danger, where no danger exists ;—another anticipates ill, and believes himself humble. If, in the perishable term of mortal life, we are grateful for the good bestowed, yet duly mindful that all earthly good is evanescent, we can scarcely fail to estimate eternal life as it should be estimated. Gloom must yield to innocent cheerfulness—fear to modest hope.

CHAP. V.

"Ah! how unjust to nature and himself,
Is thoughtless, thankless, inconsistent man!"

Not to dwell longer on the melancholy subject, suffice it to say, that the little orphan became the immediate charge of Celia. Jessy was consigned to the tomb, and her sorrowing parent retired (after an afflicting, yet not inconsolable, interview with our heroine) to his solitary home.

That paragraph which, in fashionable life, is sometimes an excellent philippic and sometimes the ebullition of malice, had drawn Collins from his humble retirement. He thought, and with justice, that the marriage of Berton would make his child a desolate, if not an abandoned woman; and he fled to London, to rescue her, and warn the woman to whom the artful betrayer had worn the mask of honour. The result has been pourtrayed. In vain Berton wrote, and implored the justly indignant Collins to grant him an interview—to let him protect the child: he was inexorable—"I forgive you," said he, in the only answer he ever accorded—"Your child is in the care of a virtuous woman. I would not have yielded this right, had I not felt that your last victim has not long to remain in this world."

The effect was such as might be expected. On the unenlightened, guilt usually induces intemperance; on those who are termed polished, the effect is the same; but we call it dissipation. The villa at Highgate was sold; for furniture, and trees, "and flowers, will speak, with most miraculous organ," to some minds. Berton was not cheerful—he was gay; and his parents, while they wondered at the change, were blessed in the deception, for they were unacquainted with facts.

Lady Townly saw the zeal of Celia, as exerted towards the little George, with an eye truly worldly; she believed that nothing but love for the father could induce such kindness for the son. But when Celia expressed her detestation of the libertine, and explained her views for the child, her Ladyship was more than usually severe. Our heroine was not to be laughed out of her purpose; and the answer of Mrs. Mansfield being favourable to her wishes, she summoned Patty to her dressing-room, and was proceeding to give directions for her immediate departure with the child, whom she wished to remove ere Lady Berton could see him, when an unexpected obstacle presented itself.

"Me, Miss!" said Patty, "must I go?"

"It is my wish you should," said Celia; "I can rely on your care, and the little fellow is delicate."

"Certainly, Miss," said Patty; "but indeed, Miss Celia, I like London much better than I thought I should—I hope I may come back again?"

Celia paused; there was a visible confusion in her domestic, that alarmed her—"It would be an useless fatigue," said Celia; "for I shall soon follow you."

Patty blushed—"I hope you will forgive me," said the weeping girl; "but I am married."

"Married!" said Celia; "to whom?"

"To Mr. Donnel, Ma'am," replied Patty; "he is a very good young man; and I have wrote to Mrs. Wilkins to ask Madam for my money, as we mean to go into business in London."

Celia owned it was too late to offer advice; but she feared that her unsuspecting attendant had been the dupe of a designing man. Telling Mrs. Donnel to consult with her husband, and consider whether they were not more likely to succeed in the country than in London, she bade her expect her assistance, in any moderate plan they might suggest.

Patty

Patty hastened to impart the blissful tidings. She returned, however, in a few minutes—" He will not consent," said Patty; " he says the country always gives him the vapours; and he has the prospect of being groom to a buck soon, and that is very profitable."

Celia ventured to explain—" it was an uncertain employ; they were exposed to much hazard," &c. &c.

" Oh no, Ma'am," said Patty, who had become a most fashionable convert, " it is the easiest life—why, their masters drive them, and they wear such nice clothes, and get such presents, for them sort of gentlemen have a great many fancies, and if a hat is not made as they like, they give it to their grooms, and they even buy nosegays to make them look smart; and then, as to living, why, they get champagne very often at their dinner—to be sure, Donnel says they are not regular in their pay; but then the profits make up for that."

had made a bad choice; and worse than all, she feared her principles had suffered an innovation, that her now fixed destiny would establish—"and this," thought Celia, "is the effect of a season in London. Poor Patty, if she was 'in search of a husband,' she has attained her object; pray Heaven she may not repent her weak credulity!"

Patty undertook the tender charge; and our heroine, as she saw the little orphan depart, felt gratitude of the most poignant sort.

"God, I thank thee," said Celia, "that in my weak hands thou hast placed the power to be useful!—may I never pervert that only good of riches, 'its affiliating balm!'—direct me, oh gracious Providence, by thy unerring guide, and while my faith leads me to ask thy illumination, may my deeds prove acceptable in thy sight!"

If the applause of the world can smooth even the features of age, and give confidence to its aspiring votaries, it is no less certain that conscious integrity owns a power infinitely superior; superior; for it is retired, and consequently an ineffable charm in woman.

Celia had announced her intended departure, and had met from her sister some opposition, but more ridicule—"It is not my dislike to London," said Celia, "which influences my determination; its amusements are in many points attractive; and I think it is possible to be as happy here as in any place; but then the mind must be free. I would not be compelled to go into society, when my spirits were not equal to the exertion; nor would I open my doors indiscriminately to all the town. Select your friends, and London is an intellectual mart; but when I behold the smile of friendship in one morning, which has in the preceding one been impertinently satirical, when I hear the same voice, nay the same breath, censure and applaud, I must deplore that weakness which sacrifices reason to fashion."

"Celia," said Lady Townly, "you will pine for the varieties of this wicked town;

you have acquired a taste for elegancies, which will be ill supplied by the sameness at Hadley."

"I think not," said Celia; "but if I should feel the vacuum, I will not be disingenuous."

The entrance of Lady Bab Blindon and her brother gave a turn to the conversation.

"Is it true we are doomed to lose you?" said Mr. Danbury—"Cruel Miss Delacour! like a meteor, you have shone in our path, and now you withdraw your beams."

"All luminaries are transient," said Celia, smiling; "but as this is by no means a dull era, take comfort—a constellation may bless your sight."

"Poor Lady Milner!" said Lady Bab—"only think! her tyrant has made no settlement on her, and is so impertinently jealous, that she is more miserable than she was with Ellincourt."

"Ungrateful wretch!" said Lady Townly—"I pity her from my heart."

"She

"She looked very lovely this morning," said Danbury; "I met her at Bridoon's; her spirits are much lowered; they say, but I don't believe it, that Sir Frederick was not anxious to marry her; nay, that she was forced to supplicate him, and affect sickness, ere she gained her point."

"Milner was always proud," said Lady Townly; "and I doubt not is vexed internally that she will not be received at Court; but, to my idea, this is a matter of no consequence; for the expence is immense in these cases."

"The ejection costs something," thought Celia; "and the record is made in another Court."

"I know you are domestic, my fair Cinderella," said Lady Bab, addressing our heroine, "you should go to the ———; really it is vastly curious."

"It's a famous lounge," said Danbury; "yet I'll be quizzed if it does not confuse me; for the Rumford stoves, and the Amazonian teakettle, the statues, the maps, and the library, were so jumbled in my brain yesterday, that I dreamed last night, that, by galvanic power, my head was boiled in that hideous kettle, and the librarian, with a learned benediction, pronounced the effect to be, that my intellects would henceforth be the mirror of human wisdom—but I awoke."

"And day brought back your night," said Lady Townly, laughing.

"An excellent jeu d'esprit," said Danbury, "admirable, upon my soul!—I will transmit that."

Lord Quadrige and Sir Robert Vat were announced. The usual salutations having passed, Sir Robert advanced to Danbury—"No hoaxing," said he; "be honest—Did you insert the paragraph in the Post this morning?"

Mr. Danbury declared, on the honour of an author, he had not scribbled for the last three days.

"I will trace the foul calumny," said Sir Robert

Robert—" nothing but vanity could induce the impertinence."

" Sheer envy, by the gods!" said Lord Quadrige; " but, my dear Bob, what could lead you to think Danbury capable of such a thing?"

" I know he writes," said Sir Robert, " and have seen his paragraphs so often, that I would have betted my beaver as to the style."

The ambiguous smile of the suspected author was observed by Lady Townly—she enjoyed a little innocent mischief.

" Give us the fact," said her Ladyship; " I am a faithful translator of countenances; I shall detect him."

" The Post of this morning," said the enraged buck, " speaks of the barouche-driving club as having made a poor exhibition in its last meeting; the beavers are not accurately described; and, above all, the cattle are reviled—by Heavens! they say they are not blood, not high-bred. Can anything be more vexatious? I observed that that we did not collect such an audience as usual; and am persuaded it was a combination to damn our fame."

"Guilty in part, but not in toto," said Lady Townly—"that is, he laughs at your anger, while he refutes your charge."

"What a charming arbitress!" said Danbury—"But, my good fellow, your anger is suspicious—nay, you own the gaze was not equal to that of former meetings."

The Baronet looked vexed—Lady Bab declared she preferred a barouche to any other carriage—Lord Quadrige smiled; he was of opinion that her Ladyship's approbation went beyond the barouche: its owner was rich and dashing, and her Ladyship had been remembered at three birth-days, consequently her "search for a husband" was doubtful.

"It is with infinite pleasure I witness your chagrin," said Lady Townly, addressing Sir Robert; "how obvious it is, that even your most favourite pursuits, ungraced by our presence, cease to charm!"

"We

"We had an immense concourse in the Square," said Danbury; "it was famous to see the variety of classes assembled:—the country gentry, who make their annual visits to London, to get fashions, and carry home food for rural envy—the sober citizens, who will peep at the fun, while their moral feelings are shocked at the vastness of the expence—and the dear sweet creatures whom one knows, smiling on our feats, waving their lily hands, and, with a fund of discernment, passing sentence on the style, trappings, and architecture of the carriages."

"Do you ever take up casualties on the road?" asked Celia, with a smile.

"That's a good one," said Sir Robert; "it reminds me of an excellent joke:—Territ and I were in Berkshire about a month since—we took the whim to push off for London—it was past twelve o'clock at night—we ordered our fellows to sound the horn as we passed through the towns—in coming through Farringdon, an old woman screamed out of a garret window—

'Is

'Is that the Exeter coach?'—I pulled in; 'And what then?' said I—'There's a good soul,' said she; 'do make room for my poor old man; he's going to Lunnon to see Jack; he's listed for a soldier, and I'm afeard he will be gone before his father sees him.'—'I'm full,' says I; 'good night t'ye."

"How cruel!" said Celia.

"Cruel, my dear Madam!" said Sir Robert; "why, if we suffered these sort of things to overtake us, there would be no end to the intrusions."

"Curse me if I could have refused," said Danbury; "the old fellow could not have been very heavy."

—"And it would assuredly have completed your assumption as a cocher," said Celia.

"Very well, Miss Delacour, you improve, I perceive," said Lady Bab; "yet this naïveté becomes you vastly: but I must agree with Sir Robert, that such condescensions would be derogatory in gentlemen coachmen."

Mr.

Mr. Belford and Lady Desmond were announced—"The very person I was dying to see," said Lady Desmond, addressing our heroine; "are we to congratulate you?—Ah! I see it is true; Mr. Berton is the favoured lover."

Celia, while blushing under an association so ill suited to her feelings, in a few words contradicted the report.

"You must not mind what the papers say in this respect," said Lady Bab; "I believe they gave me to all the young men of note when I first came out."

"They have given it over some time, Bab," said Mr. Danbury, with a loud laugh.

Her Ladyship coloured, and, with a forced smile, declared there was not such a Hottentot in existence as her brother.

"How are the girls?" said Lady Townly, turning to Lady Desmond; "what are their present pursuits? I am always curious in regard to your family, your arrangements are are so judicious, so unlike all the mothers I know."

"You do me honour," replied Lady Desmond; "they are at present employed in charcoal portrait-painting—it is innocent and amusing."

"And admirably calculated to improve the hands," said Mr. Belford, laughing.

"Will it injure the skin?" said Lady Desmond; "this never occurred to me—Allow me to write a note," she added; "I will instantly apprize the girls of their danger."

"I don't know that it is worse than cobbling," said Mr. Belford, "or walking according to modern style."

"Walking! good Heavens!" said Lady Bab, "does walking hurt the hands?" and she surveyed her own with minute attention.

"It is not the healthful exercise of walking," continued Mr. Belford, "to which my remark refers; but that Amazonian swing swing of the arms, that ungraceful, unfeminine movement, now so general with women. I declare to you, that from a strict observation of the hand and arm, I am tempted to believe that its beauty is greatly diminished by this vulgar custom; and, with a few exceptions, my memory establishes the opinion:—my own mother, and a number of females, whom I remember some twenty years since, were eminently superior in this distinguishing mark of delicacy. In fact,

> 'The modest look, the castigated grace,
> The gentle movement, and slow measur'd pace,
> For which her lovers died, her parents pray'd,
> Are indecorous with the modern maid."

"What a provoking creature!" said Lady Townly: "It is really very hard upon us that such idle bachelors are suffered in society; while they appear the most insignificant animals in creation, they are treasuring up impertinent satire, as if their opinions could be of consequence."

"I shall

"I shall see you and Lady Bab, aye, and Lady Desmond, with all her young cobblers," said Belford, "walking according to ancient custom."

"Never!" said the ladies in a breath. "Nothing so formal can be tolerated by women in a certain rank. But allow me to add, thou cynical Aretin," said Lady Townly, "that beside the illiberality of your remark, there is something vastly cruel in attacking us poor women.—How do the men walk, I would ask you?"

"They do not walk," said Belford; "they slide."

"That's a famous go," said Sir Robert; "quiz me if that is not an odd one—pray explain; I like your gig."

"Lady Desmond is more competent to this definition," said Belford, smiling; "for the defect takes rise in the shoemaking department—or rather the boots. The women have wisely discarded all idea of artificial height; and the men have taken up the feminine vanity. I have more than once felt a hand on my shoulder, which, from the noise of the heels, I had considered to be female; nay, once I turned with grateful rapture—'My dear creature!' says I; and behold it was a colonel in the Guards—'In the name of wonder!' I cried, 'what boots have you devised for your fantastic toe?'—'They are admirably calculated to give height,' said my friend.—'If you were exposed to the fire of the enemy,' said I, 'this remark would do honour to your courage; but as I believe your field of action to lie in the purlieus of St. James's, I should consider it as of no advantage to any but your bootmaker, while your neck is endangered by your uncertain footing.'—An old bachelor's opinion had no weight," continued Belford; "the fashion is general, and will remain so, till some other foolery is invented."

"I must remark on one part of your stricture," said Lord Quadrige—"that of imagining that we think of height;" and he passed his fingers through his hair, agreeable to the "usage of fashion."

"You illustrate the fact, while you reject the imputation," replied Belford—"I believe it now to be a habit, which will take its course. An 'idle bachelor,' as Lady Townly terms me, may be allowed to use his eyes: I will use mine, because I consider it beneficial to my moral happiness, and a solace which the pity of the ladies should willingly accord to a class of men existing under their indifference: but there is scarcely a more marked stage of fashionable consideration, as applied to external appearance, than that interval between the rap at the door and the admission of the prepared visitor."

Celia smiled; she anticipated the explanation, for she had witnessed the exhibition.

Lord Quadrige started from his seat—"Avaunt! I'll hear no more!" said the Peer, in a theatrical attitude—"my brain's on fire."

"You

"You look frightened," said Belford, laughing.

"Pshaw! hang your soliloquy!" said Sir Robert—"Pray, Sir, proceed," addressing Belford.

"Why, when a modern beau has announced himself by an appropriate rap at the mansions of his friends, he uncovers his head, ruffles his hair 'à la porcupine,' then tips his hat on his forehead, in order to preserve that furieux appearance so necessary in the present costume of the tête, and thus enters the drawing-room, flushed and frightened to the very climax of manly beauty."

"I declare this is beyond bearing," said Lady Bab—"What can be more beautiful, more captivating, than the crops of the men? You antediluvian beaux, you sigh for powder, because time will tell tales."

"Time cannot intrude now as formerly," said Belford; "at least, if he presumes, we can cut him off—Russian oil and Bowman's toupees would give the semblance of youth, even to the tyrant himself."

Danbury forced himself to agree with Belford, lest a further denouement of fashionable aids should be adduced. He wore his whiskers at this moment, with more of fear than valour.

"I know not how to estimate you, Belford," said Lord Quadrige: "either you are a most illiberal cynic, or really have the interest of your sex at heart."

"Then you admit my strictures to be just," said Mr. Belford; "you do me justice in believing me anxious that man, collectively, should hold his destined rank in society. I admit, that there was a period in which French frippery had gained an ascendency over the men, truly ridiculous; yet even that epoch was not destitute of intellectual emanation—now the Roman contour is the fashion; but the Roman mind, the attic hoard, where are they? We have gladiators and charioteers; but then they they are merely bruisers and coachmen. If we see a conspicuous folly contrasted by a virtue which claims our regard, our esteem, we are naturally disposed to look to the fair side; nay, there is in the eccentricities, the whims of the young and happy, a something, that while it awakens our fears, demands our lenient chastening. The season is short: if he gains a little experience from his sacrifices, it may stand him in good need; but where all is mirth and notoriety, where, when a man dies, and his stud and his carriages are sold, no vestiges of his having been remains, how lamentable is this, how unworthy of men, who have sipped from the wisdom and maxims of the ancients! where is your emulation?"

"Do you approve of classical studies for young ladies?" said Lady Desmond, turning to Mr. Belford.

"Women of real taste," said Mr. Belford, "scarcely need direction in this particular. Genius is soaring; and their delicacy, like their judgment, will lead them to correct decisions. But if you mean by ladies, school girls, I say no, positively not. Make them useful, intelligent, and moderately accomplished; but let their reason be matured, ere they go beyond their depth."

"Then I am right as yet," said Lady Desmond; "but really, since I read Cœlebs, nothing but the Stanleys has run in my brain. I have discharged my housekeeper, because she was a fine lady, and have engaged the most complete piece of antiquity you ever beheld; and, to complete my satisfaction, her name is Nonfit, instead of Comfit. I have put Maria under her care; but she is not quite pleased with her station as yet; and, to my utter plague and astonishment, I have been forced to send for a writing-master again, for the girl cannot calculate the most trifling bill. That book will do wonders, I pronounce; nay, already I have banished all my little ones from the dining-room, and have ordered a mason and carpenter to send down proper materials for erecting a temple; and when we go to Woodfield, Woodfield, I will make the young folks try their skill in raising it themselves."

The company smiled; Lady Townly was lavish in her praises of the plan; while Belford, with impressive irony, bade her Ladyship beware of raising a fabric of the sort—"Human knowledge," said the eloquent satirist, "was, by the erection of a presumptuous edifice, disseminated in the variety of languages that the dispersion caused; but in the case before us, human intellect alone could suffer: yet if a chaos were to ensue in that mind whose studies are so multiplied and useless, to whom shall we refer as the primary cause of the wreck? —to the imaginary artist," continued Belford. "We all feel ourselves mortal; yet our vanity tempts us to act beyond our powers; but forgive me when I add, that the mothers of the present day are the most irresolute and credulous creatures in existence; not one of ye reflect on your own youth. Folly has made such immense strides, that, in the last twenty years, I believe that we have advanced a century in absurdities. You are not satisfied to rear amiable, rational women—no; you must astonish the town. One mother gives a musician to that temple of their false worship, 'the world;' another, 'a cobbler;' a third offers a young philosopher; a fourth, a dear artless free-thinker, who, under the character of a hoyden, says and does half a thousand things, distinct from innocence, nay, contrary to morality."

"O tempora! O mores!" said Lady Bab —"My good Belford, all this sounds vastly well; but that book to which Lady Desmond refers has said enough on morality to last our natural term—so change the subject, I beseech you."

"Fie, Lady Bab!" retorted Lady Desmond, "I did not expect this from you."

"Perhaps I shall be a better girl when I have read this wonderful publication," said her Ladyship; "but I am as yet little advanced in its pages: I always reserve it for Sunday reading."

"Horrible!"

"Horrible!" said Lady Desmond; "you shock me—my girls shall not read it yet, because I will not let them into my system; but I anticipate the most delightful treat in their remarks, whenever I shall permit them to do so—and some surprise too," she added —"Adieu!—I had almost betrayed myself." And with a countenance marked with ambiguous vanity, her Ladyship retired.

"We shall have a classical cobbler and a sentimental cook," said Lady Townly, laughing immoderately.

"The first is by no means a rara avis," said Belford; "but I agree with you—poor Lady Desmond is caught; she is now bent on educating her daughters on the Stanley plan."

Celia, to whom the scene was highly amusing, had taken little part in the conversation. The book in question had been read by our heroine: she was not qualified by disposition or vanity to offer an opinion; to its purport she did ample justice: if she wanted faith in its practicableness, it was not not so much her hopelessness in human nature, as that the plan might be made equally acceptable to the Supernal Judge, while its performance might be more simple, less austere—" If our presumption leads us to imagine ourselves inspired, the vanity will not stop here; we shall aspire to convert, to teach," thought Celia; " but if we are the humble believers in a pure and revealed religion—a religion that holds out to the penitent the most consoling and benign hope, assuredly that faith must be most perfect, in which humility is conspicuous; and the seceder who has wandered from the way of truth, of virtue, may be ' gently led,' into that path which is opened to all who ' profess themselves Christians;' where He, who, though competent to judge and search all hearts, and enlighten such as his wisdom approves, hath forbidden us to hold ourselves vauntingly, hath commanded us not to judge, but to be ' meek and lowly,' and thereby we shall attain ' that peace which the world cannot give."

As

As these reflections passed in the mind of Celia, the mild form of Jessy rose on her imagination; and as she remembered the modest fervency of the youthful sufferer, the touching humility of her awakened heart, "I saw it," said Celia, mentally—"yes, I saw hope tinge a cheek, on which despair had planted her roses: yet it was not enthusiasm; it was a grateful, a modified feeling, eloquent in its silence, and perfect in the humility of the offering."

We expect these pages, like Lady Bab's moral reservations, will either be deferred to a Sunday reading, or skipped. Though an author must submit to his fate in either case, there is no necessity for his or her yielding their opinions, selling their consciences. I (as I have before observed) am a positive antique; and while I would exhort those who are lenient to my age, and read my book, to believe me actuated for their good, rather a Mentor than a censor, I cannot forbear wishing that human criticism, criticism, like eternal mercy, was lenient, not prone to make our burthen heavier than we can bear—the thing is impossible, for the perception is too distinct to own comparison.

Yet I own my weakness—I tremble before and anticipate the fiat of that literary ordeal, the 'northern constellation.' It appears inconsistent to avow, at the same time, that the decisions of this phalanx are to me, in many cases, the very boundaries to my literary research. Their strictures are often severe, yet as often just. Their praise is ever qualified; and in this is wisdom; for vanity would intoxicate the too highly encouraged author. But however the remark may hold good, that a —— always journeys south, I must believe that his criticisms are due north. I grant the latitude is great; but he certainly does not omit to come into soundings, upon every good occasion; and I am tempted to add, before I clear Lady Townly's drawing-room of her morning visitors, and close this chapter, "Oh that I had been born north of the Tweed!"

"It wad na ha helped ye a bit," says the staunch critic.

I deny that; for though you might have given me 'short-bread,' ye would have given me comfits too.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

"Love all; trust a few;
Do wrong to none; be able for thine enemy,
Rather in power than use; and keep thy friend
Under thy own life's key: be checked for silence,
But never taxed for speech."

It appears outré to name a woman as in "search of a husband," yet the thing is literally true—what takes us from London to Cheltenham, Bath, Brighton, &c. &c. &c.? why, when we take these journies, are we solicitous to carry with us specimens of taste? the meadows, the springs, or the ocean, will neither admire our bonnets, or applaud our costume; the latter may reflect our charms, but a briny exhalation is not the essence for which we sigh; we are content with those mirrors which the art of man has devised, yet would rather be reflected in a human eye than in the

the most brilliant French plate in the kingdom.

I would not again breathe a sentence applicable to the enamel eye, now sported as an ornament by the men, lest, in satirizing a fashion, I should wound a feeling; yet I cannot forbear one trite remark—how closely allied are fashion and deformity! But my Lord Strangford, in a very beautiful translation from Camoens, swears

> "Heaven and hell are wondrous near."

Thus we must believe, that > "Extremes in nature equal ends produce,

> In man they work to some mysterious use."

But, with all my foresight as an antique, I cannot (and I have given the matter consideration) understand what lasting advantages attach to the gentleman who is a coachman, the peer who is a boxer, or the poet who rises into fame by the prostitution of his talents. Is the praise, the admiration of the day sufficient? if so, I pity ye, for,

for, in spite of Shepherd's lamps, ye are miserably in the dark. Is it that ye believe the women would not estimate you, if ye were merely enlightened? Make the attempt—the risk would be trifling, the gain certain; you are now suffered, rather than esteemed, in society; and though you seem content in general flattery, (for, believe me, it is not praise) ye might, it is fully in your power to acquire an individual approbation, indescribably valuable. I see you smile, but I feel I am in the right. The multitude may dazzle, they may, they will sooth you, in the infancy of your pursuits; but as notoriety is a puerile plant, a scion of folly, which even exotic aid cannot save, be emulous for something: it may be grateful to your vanities to be the selected objects of female favour—to be the best dancer, singer, boxer, and coachman of the day; either your declining health, or that satiety which follows all frivolous assumptions, will, ere long, open your eyes to the fallacy lacy of the system. I am aware, that to use a proverb in this age, is considered a vulgarism, yet many of them are self-evident axioms, which bear hard on our follies; for instance, though it would be impossible to convince an encouraged buck that he will find,

"Learning was better than house or land," it is not improbable, that when

"House and land are gone and spent,"

"Learning is most excellent."

But the understanding will rust; and though incrustations, as applied to gems, may enrapture the antiquarian, that precious gem, the human mind, is never so brilliant as when its polish is acquired by that action which intellectual society produces.

It was now generally known, that Miss Delacour was shortly to leave London.

The entreaties of Sir Harry to defer it a little longer were ineffectual, till he expressed his wish that Celia would see, and judge of, a governess, whom he wished to attain for Rachel. The arrangement was in every point of view desirable. Celia acquiesced, only requesting Sir Harry to delay his inquiries until she could write to Hadley. "If my aunt has not already fixed Lucy Goodwin, whom I know she was anxious to place in a family, I should rejoice that she had the charge of Rachel—it would be a fortunate coincidence."

Sir Harry was elated at the idea; and our heroine hastened to her sister, to make her a party in a concern so important to a mother.

Lady Townly was tempted to reject the plan, from no other reason than that she had not suggested it. Celia was zealous; and her Ladyship, after some demurs, fell into the scheme.

Celia had been less frequent in her calls on the Bertons since the death of Jessy; her her esteem for the worthy pair made it impossible to meet them, without a strong recurrence to their erring son.

Mr. Berton was more deeply impressed with virtuous shame, in his casual meetings with Celia, than at any other moment of his restless life; he never voluntarily came in her way; yet when he did, if his eyes met her, he was oppressed, even to confusion, while his heart, a convert to her virtues, was more than ever devoted to her.

On the morning to which this chapter of our history bears reference, a note from Lady Berton was presented to Celia; its contents ran as follow:

" Doctor Walton has alarmed us, my dear Celia, by his confidential opinion, that our dear George's health requires our care; we have resolved, in consequence, to make a tour with him, and shall set ourselves down in Devonshire for a few months, as if from choice. We are most anxious to guard our intentions from our beloved child, who laughs at my solicitude: how I regret that you cannot be our companion! Ah! my dear Celia, will it excite more than compassion in your bosom when I add, that you are the primary cause of his anxiety? Forgive me, I would not be obliged by your pity, though I am persuaded its effect would be most extensive, not only in restoring to tranquillity a heart that is wholly your's, but in blessing the most anxious of parents, and my dear Celia's affectionate friend,

"LYDIA BERTON."

Though Celia was in possession of the more immediate cause of Berton's anxiety, she had too just a conception of the misery that must attach to a man owning such cause for self-recrimination, not to feel unfeigned concern, on perusing the letter letter of her friend. She took an early opportunity of answering Lady Berton in person; and while, with genuine candour, she expressed her regrets at the visible uneasiness which tortured their parental hearts, she, with equal simplicity, avowed herself incapable of meeting their wishes.

"I do not press the subject, my dear girl, from any hope in your acquiescence," said Lady Berton; "but I must, I shall ever regret that we gave our son up to the dangers of the world, when it was so much in our power to bind him to his native shades."

"George was never calculated for retirement," said Sir Peter; "we look back now, my love, because we are disappointed; we have looked forward, for we were full of hope; yet, perhaps, we are not doomed to that extent of misery which you so timidly imagine; this may prove a happy epoch in the life of our son—his reason is taking place of his imagination; he will now see the world for what it is, and bless our age, by becoming the solace of our remaining days."

Celia was sensibly pained as she listened to the venerable Sir Peter. "Alas!" thought our heroine, "if ye knew the errors of this child of your dotage, your love might not be diminished, for nature is a powerful absolver, but your hopes in him must be weakened;" and the mental eye of Celia rested on the couch of the dying Jessy. "I saw the wreck, I witnessed the grievous sufferings of the betrayed woman. I will not, I dare not judge; but I will do more—I will hope and believe, that his severe compunction will at once mend his heart, and appease the God he has offended."

Our heroine had taken leave of her amiable friends, and, with Richard, was pursuing her way to Portman-square, when, in crossing to Holles-street, she encountered Berton.

"You will allow me to attend you?" said said Berton; and his cheek was flushed, as if he apprehended a refusal.

Celia assented, and they walked some time in silence.

"I am going to leave London," said Berton, "for a period uncertain; you are already so much acquainted with my feelings, so competent to speak of me as I deserve, that I forbear to trouble you with any detail, yet I must ask of you a reply to one question—Are you the——? God of Heaven! I cannot," said the agitated Berton; "Celia, I must write to you; bless you, Heaven bless you!" and dropping that arm which his love, as well as pride, had made a distinction highly flattering, he hastily quitted the side of our heroine, and darting down a street, left Celia to sympathize in his internal anguish.

"Am I rigid?" sighed Celia, mentally; "no, from my heart I pity you, Berton; I rejoice in this dawning of honour, this just sense of your recent defalcations: but what woman of real feeling would trust her peace to the keeping of a libertine? it may prove the vanity of love to believe that we could fix the heart hitherto unprincipled; but the trembling inferiority of a trusting woman, the aspiring gentleness of a sensitive mind, must meet, in the creature of her choice, either the idol of her hopes, her implicit faith, or certain disappointment, in her connubial happiness—for here is no medium.

"What a romantic being!" says the unmarried reader; "she may search, but she will never find a husband of this sort—there is not such a man as Cœlebs; and if there was, Miss Delacour is welcome to make him her captive, for we hate such tame pedants, such cottage-hunting, timid lovers."

Now believe me, my fair censors, I would not attempt to pourtray a Cœlebs; my vanity, nor my own experience in la belle passione, could not draw such a portrait: I would would rather use my pen to trace a natural character; I believe the cause of morality to be more faithfully served in offering a possible point for our emulation, than in any ideal perfections that fancy, however sublime, could imagine.

Our heroine had sought her sister, and learned that her Ladyship would return, and take up Miss Delacour, to make a few visits. Celia was making a few items of such presents as she purposed taking with her to Hadley, when the arrival of Patty was announced.

"How is my aunt?" asked Celia, with lively emotion.

"Madam is quite well," said Patty; "here are letters for you, Miss; and my mistress is so fond of the little boy, you can't think."

"I knew he would find a friend," said Celia, receiving her letters from the hand of her servant. "Did you see the villagers?"

"Yes, Miss; and they all crowded round me, me, to know when you would come home; and old Godfrey quite cried with joy, when I told him you would soon be at Hadley."

"Worthy old man," said our heroine.

"Madam was not so well pleased with me," continued Patty, with downcast eyes; "she says I ought to have consulted you before I married; but, indeed, Miss Celia, it was not my fault; I begged Donnel to let me tell you, but he said——;" and here Patty paused.

"What did he say?" asked Celia, with an encouraging smile.

"Why, Miss, I know you will excuse him, because he did not know your character; he said, that country ladies were over nice, and would sooner all their servants died old maids and old bachelors, because they got their services so cheap; and always held up town servants as so wicked, that they might frighten the pretty girls from marrying."

Celia looked with compassion on the credulous credulous Patty; and while her discernment led her to conclude Mr. Donnel a finished London servant, she wisely forbore any remark, for Patty had found a husband.

The letters of Mrs. Mansfield were in her usual strain of eloquent tenderness; she rejoiced in the approaching meeting, promised Celia an agreeable surprise, thanked her for having sent the little orphan to her care; and concluded by saying, that the family of Mr. Walsford had taken charge of Lucy Goodwin, who would be in London in a few weeks. "Tell Fanny," said Mrs. Mansfield, in the close of her letter, "that I wish her to receive my young protegé, till she attains a situation. I could have wished that you had superintended a decision so important to a youthful adventurer; but your sister must act for me, as I cannot bring myself to bear a longer separation from my Celia. Lucy will not make any final engagement without out my concurrence. I wish that Fanny could see her as I do, and retain her in her own family."

Celia owned grateful delight in this request of her beloved relative; it proved the similarity of their sentiments: and the arrangement having gained the assent of Lady Townly, she was at ease with regard to the infant Rachel, whose glowing mind, thus suffered to expand, in the society of an amiable and unaffected young woman, would, she trusted, prove an ornament to her rank, and a comfort to her parents.

"But what is the surprise I am to meet?" asked Celia, with all the curiosity of her sex; "I cannot imagine—the Bertons and the Walsfords having quitted Hadley, I am at a loss to conjecture." A second thought chased the aristocratic reflection—"May it not be a village annal?" thought our heroine. "The short and simple annals of the poor are highly interesting; yes, my dear aunt has been active in effecting some new happiness amongst her dependants, ants, and she anticipates the delight with which I shall share her feelings."

The return of the carriage warned Celia to join her sister.

"I hope you are in good spirits," said Lady Townly, as our heroine entered the barouche. "I am going to Desmond's, to row her—exactly as we suggested, she is seeking a tutor for her daughter: but listen, Celia; here is the convincing proof;" and her Ladyship read from the body of the Times the following paragraph:—

"Wanted, in a family of fashion, a confidential person to teach the classics to a young lady; such a one, bringing credentials of his ability, character, &c. may apply at ——, York-street, St. James's."

"But how can you be certain it is Lady Desmond who inserts this?" asked Celia.

"I would vouch for its being her," said Lady Townly; "the reference is in her neighbourhood; but previous to an investigation, we may endeavour to gain all the proofs we can; so, sans ceremonie, I will first

first go to the shop, sound the people, and if Desmond should tax me with underhand information, I can forget I have been at the shop, you know—such things are not sanctioned; and I should not wonder if I was to get gold boxes from half a thousand mamas who are not in the classical party."

Celia was compelled to smile at the whimsical badinage of her sister; yet she took occasion to mention the purport of her aunt's letter, to which Lady Townly gave more than usual attention.

"I believe the plan to be excellent," said her Ladyship; "and I am truly glad, that for once I have the power to please aunt Martha and gratify myself; yet believe me, Celia, if I did not know that the system which will be adopted with Rachel is out of the usual track, somewhat eccentric, I could not have assented. Forgive me, I see your grave phiz with due reverence: but Rachel is my daughter—I would not present her to the world an everyevery-day Miss—the thing is impossible: but I am really contented in the plan; and Harry will be so grateful for my condescension, that I expect a liberal fee for my dutiful submission."

The carriage stopped at a pamphlet-shop. "I wish to recommend a person to the situation advertised this morning," said Lady Townly to the man who attended.

"If you will give me the gentleman's address, Madam, I will forward it," said the man.

"My friend would not submit to this," said her Ladyship, with easy effrontery; "but bring me some visiting-tickets and card-cases to look at."

The shopkeeper hastened to obey her order.

Selecting a quantity of each, she drew her purse—"Now the name of the family advertising," she continued.

The man paused—the money was ready, and and his promise of secrecy was forgotten. "Lady Desmond, Madam," said the yielding trader.

Her Ladyship smiled graciously, and in a few minutes the ladies were admitted in St. James's-square.

If Celia had owned astonishment in her former visits, the present was not calculated to diminish the feeling. Lady Desmond, with a pile of folio volumes, was leaning on a large table; her elder daughter, with a countenance, serious even to melancholy, was poring over a Latin grammar; while Maria, a tall, healthy-looking girl, in a bib and apron, was explaining the component ingredients of a plumb-pudding.

"Ah! my dear friends," said Lady Desmond, "grant me one minute, and I am your's."

The ladies bowed acquiescence.

"Tell Mrs. Nonfit," continued her Ladyship, "that I am greatly pleased with your improvement: but be careful of your hands,

hands, Maria; and when you have seen the pudding mixed, be sure you order Fenning to attend to your toilet; use plenty of almond-paste and rose-water; for though I am anxious to have you a housekeeper, the degrading assumption must not transpire: perhaps we may, at some distant period, find it necessary to divulge the fact; but at present, be uniformly secret. Can you decline that noun?" added her Ladyship, turning to her elder daughter.

"I would willingly decline the lesson," said Miss Desmond, poutingly.

"I blush for you, Miss Desmond," said the mortified mother; "tame, unlettered girl, you cannot discern my plan, or you would need no philippic to attain the elevated pursuit. Go, Madam, retire to your chamber; Maria is dutiful."

The weeping girl withdrew; and Celia, whose disgust to the mother was only equalled by her pity for the daughter, saw her departure with compassionate interest.

"My dear Townly," said Lady Desmond, "your sagacity will elucidate my little plan—have not I made immense advances lately?"

Lady Townly pretended ignorance, for she delighted in making the ridiculous more prominent.

"Yes, my dear friend, Miss Desmond is to be the Lucilla of my family; I have been ransacking the library this morning, and have collected all these volumes already; and in order not to lose time, I have begun with the grammar myself"

"Why not engage a tutor?" said Lady Townly, archly.

"Great wits jump," said Lady Desmond; "I have actually advertised for one. Well, I shall now feel doubly satisfied in my arrangement—your opinion is of great value with me."

"Have you a Cœlebs in your eye?" asked Lady Townly, with saucy freedom.

"Further this deponent sayeth not," replied the speculating hostess; "no, my dear dear creature, even to you I cannot be explicit."

"How cruel!" said Lady Townly; "you know I am married, and Miss Delacour is so romantic, that her 'search of a husband' will be the phantom to sooth her declining days; nay, she is going to rusticate with the fawns and dryads at Hadley; so you have nothing to fear from that quarter."

"Excuse me," said Lady Desmond, "not yet, my dear Townly—But I am immensely sorry that you think of leaving us, Miss Delacour; the beaux will languish—Have you heard what an accession of fortune Ernmore has got?" she continued; "really it is preposterous to see Frost chaperoning that young man as she does; he is an elegant scholar, I understand; his poetry is considered highly classical; he has wonderful genius—he has invented a coal scuttle, on a plan so unique, that a model has been cast from the design."

"Ernmore will never marry Miss Frost," said Lady Townly; "he is not a young man, to be led into a scheme of the sort—he appears quiescent at present, but it is only till he can act for himself."

"You think so—well, that is exactly my opinion," said the speculating mother. "I rather think his feelings are lively; he might be surprised into love, but not teazed into a weak compliance."

"Exactly so," retorted Lady Townly; "a woman of enlarged mind—in fact, a learned woman, might make him her willing slave."

Lady Desmond smiled ambiguously; and Celia drew from the silly mother, that Lord Ernmore was her Ladyship's Cœlebs in embryo.

The arrival of Mr. Belford was announced—"Where are the cobblers?" said he, looking round; "ah! a metamorphosis; the stall is broke up, I perceive—a bookstand!" and he advanced to the table, and turned the volumes over. "Latin is the order order of the day," said Belford; "are these laid out for sale? or are they likely to be used?"

"I would not have him know for the world," said Lady Desmond, in a half-whisper, "he is so severe—They came in my way this morning," continued her Ladyship; "and I have always a melancholy pleasure in looking into such books as my Lord approved."

Celia blushed—to her there was something truly melancholy, in thus calling the name of a deceased husband forward—nay, the assertion was a palpable falsehood.

Lady Townly was projecting some way of eliciting the secret, when, just as her active fancy had suggested a mode, a servant announced a s ranger, who came from Mr. ———, in York-street.

Lady Desmond started from her seat—"Not here!" said she; "shew him into my boudoir."

It was too late—the candidate was already in the room. Her Ladyship now, according to the "usage of society," referred to her eye-glass; and, while she surveyed the young man with deep attention, the words—"Oh! you are the person from Mr. ———; I hope you can bring good recommendations?"

The young man blushed—it was a blush which Celia translated as one of honest pride, at being addressed so cavalierly, and in company.

"If your Ladyship is engaged," said the stranger, "I can call again."

"No, I will settle the matter at once; there is no time to be lost;" and, asking leave of her visitors, her Ladyship withdrew with the stranger.

"He is very young for a tutor," said Lady Townly. "Mon Dieu! I have betrayed the secret; poor Desmond!—Belford, let me beseech of you not to say I named it."

"Make yourself easy," said Belford; "she will give us the fact, soon as she returns. So the young man, now closeted with with this weathercock mother, is to be the tutor of Miss Desmond? The result may be easily foreseen; and if he is amiable, she may be happy it ends so well."

"What do you think of that person?" asked Lady Desmond, as she rejoined her company; "I like his appearance; there is something gentlemanly in his figure and manner—and he is poor, for he came into my terms instantly."

"That is as it should be," said Lady Townly; "for when one employs a person in these situations, it is indispensible that they should feel some sort of inferiority—for nothing is so mortifying as that pride which a pedant assumes"

"Or, rather, nothing wounds the self-sufficient so much, as being compelled to admire those on whom fortune has frowned," said Belford. "I am half offended with you," he continued, addressing Lady Desmond; "you are resolved on giving a classical finish to your girls, though you in part agreed with me yesterday."

"My dear Sir," said Lady Desmond, "the impulse is irresistible with me at this moment; the Stanley family haunt me day and night—I dream of that beautiful cottage scene—I behold Mrs. Carlton working the reformation in her husband, and ——"

"And you wish you had a husband to comfort," said Belford, laughing.

"Fie upon you, Mr. Belford; this levity is unpardonable," said her Ladyship. "But my dear Townly, forgive me, when I candidly avow, I see a strong likeness between Miss Sparkes and Cardonnel—nay, now don't be angry—Cardonnel was never a favourite of mine—apropo, what excessively odd things they say of her just now!"

"Cardonnel is an amiable lively creature," replied Lady Townly; "and, like all young and handsome widows, must expect envy, hatred, and malice; she is as much above their attacks, as their vain imitations—really I am very angry with you—you—Miss Sparkes! good Heavens! there is not the smallest similarity."

"Well, I declare I was vastly sorry to hear it; but at Lady Mump's last night, it was whispered that Bridoon is her shadow —that poor Lady Bridoon is totally neglected— nay, more, that Cardonnel has established card-parties at her house, and actually fitted up a billiard-room, expressly for the purpose of detaining Bridoon, who is known to prefer the pastime."

"This is not scandal," said Belford.

"Pardonnez moi, my dear Sir; no, positively I deny the intent—I only speak what I heard; and, as I before observed, was much grieved at the information."

"Yet you have disseminated the cruel tale," replied Belford. "Lady Townly, if she was not, as she has avowed, attached to Lady Cardonnel, might extend it yet further—thus ruining the fair name of woman on mere report, a rout-whisper, the very mockery of common sense."

"I can depend upon my friend, Lady Townly," Townly," said the artful slanderer; "my dear creature, you will not breathe a sentence on the subject—if it is true, we shall all hear it in a short time—apropo, Hayman is found out at last."

"Some new miserly invention, I will vouch," said Lady Townly. "I hate the creature, she has such an unmerciful appetite when she dines in company."

Celia regarded her sister with fearful expectation; she laid her hand on the arm of Lady Townly, as if to check her eloquence.

"My conscientious little prude," said her Ladyship, "Hayman is my aversion; it was her whom I quizzed about the Argyle Rooms—the creature absolutely is a pauper—she lives upon the public."

"You shall hear," rejoined Lady Desmond. "I went to the Repository, in the Haymarket, yesterday; Hayman's carriage was waiting. Upon going into the room, she was in the act of settling with the conductor, for some things that had been sold;

sold; I stepped up unperceived—'Why did not this sell?' said she—it was a paste-board tidy. 'The ladies said there was a defect in it, Ma'am,' said the woman; 'it is a little soiled by ink, if you observe.' 'Aye, a mere trifle,' said Hayman; 'sell it for half price—the poor woman who makes them is in great distress, and I am very anxious to get all I can for her.' Now I," continued Lady Desmond, "was witness to this same accident of the tidy—it occurred, from the epicure's haste to write an apology for not going to one dinner, because another of a more luxurious sort had offered—thus I was qualified to judge, ipso facto. I put my head over her shoulder—'A very pretty box that,' says I. —'Ah! how are you? how are you?' said she, and she dragged me to the other end of the room, and began such a desultory conversation, that I was forced to yield my first intention of quizzing her. I determined, however, to see her out, and question tion the woman—whether she saw my purpose, I cannot say, but she soon retired.

'That lady,' says I, addressing the woman, 'is a very liberal patron of the poor—don't you find her so?'

'Why, indeed, Ma'am, I don't know what to think of that lady,' said the woman; 'she is so exorbitant in what she expects for the works that she brings, that the Lady visitors are quite frightened when I shew them—and as to worked handkerchiefs, she has made them quite a drug—I believe I have sold two or three dozen for her—but, to be sure, she says that the poor family who work them are in great distress, and have a great many girls, so they make quick work, no doubt.'

"This was all I wanted; and I now perfectly comprehended why she employs all her young friends to work habit-shirts, &c. for her—what a cunning old speculist it is!"

Our heroine felt all the disgust that a male-malevolence so pointed could induce; even admitting that the calumniated was exactly the person described, there was so little of Christian charity in the elucidation, so evident a pleasure marked the manner of the elated tattler, that Celia, whose countenance did justice to her feelings, regarded her Ladyship with a look of calm displeasure.

Lady Townly enjoyed the denouement, and united with her classical friend, in deprecating the old cheat—"You have done an essential good to society," said her Ladyship; "I thank you, in the name of half a thousand of my friends, who, I know, will see the matter in a just point of view."

"Poor Hayman!" said Belford, "I pity her from my soul—she is in bad hands; nor can I attach the least fault to her intentions in all you have related. In the first place, if she employed her young friends in innocent needle-work, in place of making them a party in a round of morning visits, I have

I have just learned enough to know, that their principles, and their delicacy, may be spared, in the fortunate exclusion; and if she has entered on the life of a gambler (a thing generally known), we are all apprised that such a character is not supported by honourable means—she could not face her friends and enemies at a card-table with an empty purse—which of you would trust her?"

"Not I," said Lady Desmond and her friend, in a breath.

"Seriously, then," said Mr. Belford, "to drop all hyperbole, she is wrong, inasmuch as she overstocks the market, and, by pretending to serve the poor, receives what is their due—it is contemptible as a deception—yet I cannot think her less delicate than the woman who, to fill her purse, traffics with a Jew, or shares the hoard of the candlestick with her butler."

"She is a petty peculator," said Lady Townly; "do not defend her, Belford—I could forgive the woman who does things with with a dash—but she is the meanest of the mean."

Belford shook his head, while Celia appeared impatient to take leave.

Lady Townly arose—"I wish you success with your Lucilla," said her Ladyship, with a smile; "adieu."

Celia made this her parting visit; and the fashionable hostess, following to the gallery, was profuse in her expressions of regret, at the immense despair those persons must sustain, who had been honoured by the acquaintance of Miss Delacour.

"What an illiberal, ungenerous woman!" said Celia, as she took a seat in the carriage; "I thought her, till this morning, simply ridiculous; but so much of cruelty has shewn itself this day, that I am persuaded you will see the necessity of dropping this woman's acquaintance."

"Why, in fact, Celia," said Lady Townly, "though I defended Cardonnel, I believe the report to be well-founded. I know know that poor Car was much involved; and, in the one or two last calls I made, there was certainly a visible alteration in her establishment—and I am well assured, that nothing but poverty made Bridoon marry old Snowdon; thus you see the scandal, as you call it, wears a most suspicious face."

"Then you will not visit Lady Cardonnel?" said our heroine.

"There again you are too precipitate, my dear moral Celia; I have the greatest esteem for Cardonnel, she is a charming companion, and her house is highly attractive—I must not cast the first stone; no, we must let the matter rest a little while—if I were to drop her, numbers would follow the example—and really, when one considers a little, there is much to be said on both sides."

"Fanny, this is beyond your usual gaieté," said our heroine; "if you thus cease to respect yourself, what countenance nance can you expect from others, from those by whom it is honourable to be esteemed?"

"In this is the chief advantage of rank," said her Ladyship; "the world is slow to credit the defalcations of its superiors, while they can pay the price of its forbearance; but then, the least semblance of poverty undraws the veil, and the most presuming satire is levelled at us; thus, you perceive, it is dangerous to give the rabble any licence. I dare say Cardonnel, who does not want address, will act with caution; and, indeed, I consider her as very unfortunate in having fallen into Desmond's hands, who, with all her matron airs, was by no means insensible to the fine person of Bridoon."

"Le monde est le livre des femmes, according to Rosseau," said Celia; "I must in future term it a most incongruous volume; not a chapter on which my eyes have rested in this my visit to London, that does not offer some cause for regret—

I wish it could be put into a new edition—either the style is bad, or my taste defective, for the pages to me appear any thing but the book of women."

If a fashionable reader looks into our book, they will own with the author, that nothing we could offer as a novelty could surprise them; as such, we will not lead them through a further gauntlet of morning visits, such as they make every day; the thing has been done a thousand times; we would rather leave them to strike out something new, that shall afford them pleasure, and give us a future opportunity of paving our respects to them—and if a sceptic in the ways of society should have travelled thus far with us, they will allow that we have said more than they can believe, and ignorance in such a case is bliss; for for to believe the world exactly what it is, is to lower human nature more than poor human nature could bear.

In the course of a few days, Celia saw the Bertons depart on their tour: to a laconic note of Mr. Berton's, which asked the simple question, whether Celia protected his child? our heroine returned an answer, which, while it calmed his feelings as a father, wrung his bosom with anguish unutterable.

He had believed, from the interest which Belford had taken in his victim, and from some enquiries he had made of Jessy's servant, that the lady who had taken charge of the child was Mrs. Welgrave. He had sought this amiable woman, and, with appropriate delicacy, reverted to the circumstance; she appeared wholly ignorant on the subject; and it then occurred to him, that Celia was the protectress of his deserted infant.

"God of Heaven!" said the self-condemned libertine, "this is retributive justice; where I would die to wear the smiles of a woman, I must be hated—while she, who for me abandoned her parents, her home, and her innocence—she, my murdered, my virtuous Jessy, I abandoned, left to die, for having believed me virtuous."

These sentiments, we will allow, are more those of a misled, than a naturally depraved heart, and, with these feelings, we will leave him.

Sir Harry prepared to accompany our heroine to Hadley. Lady Townly saw the arrangement, with a dejection for which she could give no name. But Belford, whose passion was that of reason, was a prey to that anguish, which his confidence in the stability of Celia made irrevocable—on the morning of her departure, he waited to attend her to the carriage—"I shall see you, my sweet friend," said Belford, "for I have a visit to make in your neighbourhood, but not yet."

Celia,

Celia, with unfeigned pleasure, expressed herself anxious to introduce him to her aunt—"You will esteem her," said Celia; "she is the very woman to please you."

"I know she is; I feel she is," said Belford; "for she formed that mind which I have contemplated with delight, and shall remember, with vain regrets—I shall never meet another Celia."

"Look around you," said our heroine, "and give me a new friend."

"Never!" said Belford; "you have turned manager here, Celia—you did not cast my character, but you have made my fate—Wear these," he continued, clasping a pair of gold bracelets on the arms of our heroine; "these, Celia, encircle your arms—your heart will not always remain free—I know your fate; but remember Belford as a friend—God bless you!"

Celia, in a voice tremulous from emotion, made a sincere response. Patty gaz-

CHAP. VII.

Flies o'er the meadow; not a cloud imbibes
The setting sun's effulgence; not a strain
From all the tenants of the warbling shade
Ascends, but whence his bosom can partake
Fresh pleasure, unreproved: nor thence partakes
Fresh pleasure only; for th' attentive mind,
By this harmonious action on her powers,
Becomes herself harmonious."———

The Baronet was strenuous in his praise of Belford during their journey; Celia did justice to the virtues of her friend—"I esteem him," said Celia; "I value his opinions, and am proud to know myself esteemed by him. I can never forget Fanny's whimsical explanation of my 'search of a husband;' how would she laugh at me, could she hear me avow, that a man less versed in the world, a man, in fact, whose sentiments were less strict, less discerning than Belford, would, with me, own a charm infinitely superior. I feel this to be a weak argument in favour of my discernment; but so it is, and I cannot reject the ideal being whom my fancy has pourtrayed; it will end in a chimera, and Fanny will have her revenge."

Sir Harry desisted from further importunity; and ere evening had closed, Celia was folded to the heart of the affectionate Mrs. Mansfield.

The lover of Nature owns a tranquillity, in a reunion with those scenes in which their youth has expanded, that language must fail in depicting; and though, while Sir Harry remained, Celia was mindful not to wound his feelings, by looking back with regret on those hours she had devoted to a town-life, the harmony of her spirits, that unrestrained action of the mind, which elicits the most attractive graces in the performance of simple duties (not only impracticable, but unimpelled in London), were to the Baronet strong proofs, that assured him Celia was formed for retired life.

Most happily would he have drawn his happiness within its sphere; it was now too late to make a perfect system of domestic happiness, with a woman like Lady Townly; yet he was projecting a partial plan, from which he was prone to hope some comfort. Sir Harry, after a few days, departed, and our heroine again entered on her grateful task of village visits. The little George, now able to walk with help, used frequently to share in her rambles; Mrs. Mansfield had given the tear of sympathy to his mother's fate; and with sincere concern, lamented the moral defection of Mr. Berton, for whose parents the liveliest feelings of a generous mind were excited—"It is a fearful thing to trust a young man to his own ways," said Mrs. Mansfield; "the impressions of early education are, in some minds, easily effaced;

George

George was always volatile, but I did not think him vicious—poor Lydia! I dread her knowing the extent of his errors This dear boy claims, at the hands of his father, a rank in society—that stigma which attaches to illegitimate birth, is more injurious to boys than girls; a female may in time lose that name which friendship or policy has given her, but a boy remains an indecisive, if not a rejected being in society: yes, Celia, however distressing it may prove, we shall not have perfected our part for the child, till we attain for him the acknowledgement of his natural relations; he wants nothing in point of pecuniary aid—but the ties of nature outweigh all sordid considerations, and we must devise some lenient way of effecting this desirable object."

Celia united in the benevolent purpose of her aunt, and promised her assistance (which, from her knowledge of the youthful mother, was important), whenever occasion should justify the attempt.

Celia

Celia had seen and been recognized by the villagers; had made old Godfrey happy, by commencing her former habit of reading to him; in short, had been active, as youth, innocence, and a benevolent heart could make her. The promised surprise recurred to her memory, and she fled from the garden in which she had been walking, to ask an explanation.

"Curiosity, my dear Celia," said Mrs. Mansfield, smiling, "it was always attributed to our sex, and, I believe, with some justice."

"Mine has slumbered a little," said Celia, "for it never occurred to me till now."

"Well, I will satisfy you," said Mrs. Mansfield; "reach me my cloak, Celia, and we will walk."

They passed through the village to a house called "the Lodge;" it had not been inhabited for some years. Celia saw with surprise that it not only wore the appearance of comfort, but elegance; the garden was in order; and though it was now the

the early part of August, Nature, ever gracious, decked the fair parterre with many a blooming ornament of her bounty.

"Who lives here?" asked our heroine.

Mrs. Mansfield entered the garden, and before they reached the house, three children, whose blooming countenances bore the liveliest testimony of infantine beauty and health, issued from the opened door, and clung to the side of Mrs. Mansfield—"How is Harriet to-day?" said Mrs. Mansfield.

"Quite well," said the elder child, a boy, "and here is a letter from papa;" and he drew the letter from his bosom, with a manly air, and gave it to Mrs. Mansfield.

"What a fine family!" said Celia, and she made advances to the two girls, who, with sweet timidity, blushed and smiled; and, at last, looking up in her face, asked, "Are you Celia?"

"Yes, I am Celia; and who are you, my little dears?"

"We

"We are Emma and Julia," said the younger of the two, who, urged by her elder sister, ventured to be eloquent.

The ladies entered the house, when an elderly woman, apparently a superior sort of domestic, with her immediate charge in her arms, advanced, and, with respectful attention, ushered them to a parlour—"The young gentleman has shewn you the letter, Madam?" said the nurse.

Mrs. Mansfield referred to the letter; and Celia, while her aunt was engaged in its perusal, was yet under the influence of curiosity. There was, in the furniture, books, and drawings, a disposition of elegance, that claimed her approbation; she had so recently quitted a fashionable mansion, or rather those repositories for furniture, now known by the name of drawing-rooms, where one's elbows are continually in danger of demolishing the pasteboard structure, that the comfortable idea of room and ease, now presented to her, appeared infinitely attractive.

"Your

"Your papa will be home in a few days," said Mrs. Mansfield, as she returned the letter to the little boy.

"Yes," said Edward, "and I am to bring him to the manor-house."

"We shall be very happy to see him," replied Mrs. Mansfield; "but you will go home with me to-day, and your sisters will go likewise—Miss Delacour wants to be acquainted with my little friends."

The children fled to get their walking dresses; and Mrs. Mansfield, now addressing the nurse, bade her, when she wrote to her master, assure him that Miss Harriet was perfectly well, and that she, if any relapse occurred, would apprize him of it. Robson promised to observe her commands. "Yet I wish my Lord was here," continued the nurse, "for master Edward is so dull of an evening; you see, Ma'am, he is so sensible, that one cannot amuse him like other children; and last night, after the young ladies were in bed, I found him crying here; and when I asked him what what ailed him, he almost broke my heart by what he said."

"Dear boy!" said Mrs. Mansfield, "he is a very intelligent child; but I hope we shall be able to raise his spirits now—my niece will unite in the attempt; she is a better walker than I am, and will have equal pleasure in mixing with your sweet little family."

"You are very good, Ma'am," said Robson; "and I am sure my Lord will thank you as you deserve."

The children, equipped for their walk, now entered the room, and the party repaired to the manor-house.

"Those dear little creatures," said Mrs. Mansfield to our heroine, "are the children of Lord Ellincourt; their cruel mother has abandoned them, and their father, whose health I learn is much injured, placed them at the Lodge about a month since. I never saw my Lord—he was called from this soon after he had settled his family; and a slight attack of the rheumatism made me for some some days a stranger to my new neighbours. Robson, the worthy woman whom you saw, dispatched a servant to the manor-house one morning, to ask what medical man I would recommend, to see a child who was suddenly taken ill. I named Anderson, and took an airing to the Lodge in the evening. The anxiety of the good Robson, and that interest which the sweet little strangers excited in my bosom, from the moment of meeting them, made me take an active part in their welfare. Robson was discreet, yet I thought somewhat ambiguous in her expressions. I grew into an intimacy with the children, which has proved a delightful solace to many hours, which your absence, my Celia, has deduced from the happiness of greatly. The convalescence of the child soon tranquillized the fears of Robson—she had written to her master, stating the illness of Harriet; but as I gathered from the zealous nurse that he was away on business of importance, and saw no reason for alarming

ing him, I deputed her to convey my sentiments on the subject, and offered my services on such points as his worthy confident should deem necessary. The reply of Lord Ellincourt was exactly what we would expect from a fond father: he has written me once or twice since, and in the letters he addresses to his son, makes my poor interference so conspicuous, that I am prepared to meet, in this dishonoured husband, all the qualities that grace a superior mind, with, I fear, too much of the sensibilities of the heart, not to be, in his situation, a very miserable man."

"I have seen Lord Ellincourt once," said Celia, "and am acquainted with a lady who is related to him;" and she sketched the character of Mrs. Welgrave, with all the warmth of her heart. "Fanny knew Lady Ellincourt, now Lady Milner," continued Celia, "whom I believe to be as wretched in her present union, as she was happy in her former. Good Heavens! how could a woman leave these dear babes!—what must be her reflections!"

"Celia," said Mrs. Mansfield, as they entered the hall of the manor-house, "the mother of that boy," pointing to little George, "was the victim of man; but a married child of error is her own victim—no reasoning can palliate an immorality so gross; and it is merciful to hope, that Lady Ellincourt's reflections are deeply compunctuous, for her crime is a blemish that repentance alone can sooth, as applied to herself, and to her sex she owes something—every female wanderer from the path of virtue casts a shade upon her sex. I cannot believe that man would judge collectively from the vices of a few; but the class is lowered in its rank, the conscious pride of innocence is humbled—we may feel strong in our own principles, for chastity is proud.

"She that has that, is clad in complete steel," and her loftiness is her armour—it is on

man that errors of this sort illustrate their baneful influence; their manners become corrupt, they mock the ordinances of Heaven, and that chastened homage, which the woman of honour might claim, is weakened—they approach her with boldness—she may be virtuous, but they recollect those in her rank who were not thought so—she may be worthy of an honourable passion, but she might not be insensible to one bearing no such distinction. Thus the woman of delicacy is a transient sacrifice to the crimes of her unprincipled equal in society."

Celia owned the justice of these sentiments, for she had heard Lady Ellincourt defended, and that error which cast her from all her natural ties, spoken of with levity—she was pitied, while Jessy was left to die—"How perverted are the rules of good order, of civil society! I remember even Berton and Belford were alarmed, lest I should be seen in visiting the deserted Jessy; while Lady Ellincourt, under a new name, is received in circles bearing the name of honourable."

The children of the deceived Ellincourt soon became dear to our heroine—they were already acquainted with her from report.

The ornaments, such as drawings, screens, and maps, which decorated the manor-house, were the works of her hands. They had learned to ask if "Celia did this? if Celia did that?" Mrs. Mansfield had taken pleasure in making them familiar, in idea, and the appearance of our heroine perfected their delight.

She would play with and instruct them, by some well-devised amusement; the infantine disputes, from which few children are exempt, were settled by her opinion —and Edward, now in his eighth year, would walk from the Lodge to the manor-house every morning, to meet Celia in the plantations. Memory is a quality by no means specific—if we are accurate in one recollection, it is as certain we may be correct in another. Thus Celia remembered the words of Mrs. Welgrave, as applied to herself, and bearing reference to Lord Ellincourt. The parting words of Belford added an imperfect link; and she recollected having seen Lord Ellincourt once well; and women are allowed to possess quick observation—and some say, that their observation helps them more than their reading. We leave that to casuists in the ways of women—but if Celia had been pressed for an opinion, she would have answered, that her observation of that speaking volume, the human countenance, was capable, in this instance, of a most copious translation. "His face was pallid, yet interesting," thought Celia; "and that sorrow which dimmed the lustre of his youth, seemed the passport to esteem, to compassion."

"Pity is akin to love," says my readers; "what a romantic creature! what a chimera! to love a man with whom she never spoke! Now I, with due humility be it spoken, have often wondered how, after having conversed with some men, you could love them; and must therefore decide in favour of the woman who woos the chimera, not knowing the man, rather than her, who, knowing the man, suffers the chimerical imposition."

"Did your mama die?" said Edward, one morning, as he joined Celia in the garden. Celia replied in the affirmative. "Then she is gone to Heaven?" said the child; "but my mama left us—will she go to Heaven?"

Celia paused—the answer required caution—"God is very good, very merciful," said Celia; "and your mama will beg him to receive her, and he always listens to our prayers."

"I know that," said the young believer; "for when Harriet was sick, I prayed to God, that if mama could not come to us, he would send somebody else to take care of us—and he did, for Mrs. Mansfield came the next day."

Our

Our heroine, while tears streamed down her cheeks, clasped the sweet boy to her bosom—"You are very wise, my dear Edward," said Celia; "God loves those who pray to him—but you must remember, that he expects us not to forget him at any time—you must never omit to ask his favour, or he will not heed you, when you want it most."

"Then mama forgot to say her prayers," replied Edward; "for when I asked papa why she did not come home, he said she had forgotten him, and me, and all of us, and God too; so, I suppose, she did not say her prayers every night, and God was offended with her. Don't you think so?"

"We cannot know exactly what is the will of God," said Celia; "we must be obedient to his pleasure, and he will take care of us."

"But I wish she would come home again," continued the child, "for we used to be so happy, and papa did not cry then, and we were allowed to go down to the dessert, and play in the drawing-room sometimes of an evening; but now papa comes into the nursery, and kisses Emma and Julia; but he always cries when he nurses Harriet, and never plays with me, as he used to do."

The artless communications of Edward were so many traits of parental excellence in the injured Ellincourt, and Celia imbibed them with a facility appropriate to their worth—"Cruel woman!" sighed Celia, "what an extensive misery have you effected! what a stigma have you cast on your innocent family! and to a husband, how indescribable must the humiliation be!"

Some days had passed in this delightful intercourse, when one evening, just as the day was closing in, Lord Ellincourt was announced at the manor-house. Edward led his father to Mrs. Mansfield—"This is Mrs. Mansfield," said he, "and that is Celia," and he pointed at our heroine.

"A most familiar introduction," said my Lord,

Lord, with a languid smile. "This boy's zeal, my dear Madam, is in unison with his father's feelings—I am deeply your debtor, yet I cannot thank you as I ought," and his voice faltered.

"Certainly not, my Lord," said Mrs. Mansfield, "if you use ceremony, where a less formal feeling would be more acceptable."

"You are very kind," said my Lord; and turning to Celia, he added—"and to you, Madam, I owe much. My little girls, with whom I have just taken my dinner, have delighted me with their prattle—of nothing but Celia could they talk; but though their familiarity may be pardoned, I should like to know the name of the lady, who has thus won them from their father."

Mrs. Mansfield introduced our heroine.

"Miss Delacour," repeated my Lord, "the sister of Lady Townly! I have just quitted some of your admiring friends, Madam—you know Mrs. Welgrave?"

ing with affectionate interest for her amiable friend.

"My cousin Margaret has been ill," rejoined Lord Ellincourt; "Welgrave met a slight accident, in a fall from his horse—he had quitted London, expressly on my account, in fact, to aid my languid spirits in fixing my family at the Lodge—we were called hence on a matter of much pecuniary interest to my boy; it was the adjustment of this which detained me from my little Harriet, for whose safety I should have been much alarmed, had not you, Madam," bowing to Mrs. Mansfield, "quieted my parental fears."

"Mr. Welgrave is recovering, I hope?" asked Celia.

"He is perfectly well for himself," said my Lord; "but his tender Margaret heard the report through a servant, and fled to him, unmindful of her own health; she travelled all night, and alone—her spirits were not equal to the fatigue, and she has been seriously indisposed; but I left them them two days since, free from all anxiety, and happy as they deserve to be.—I had the pleasure of seeing you once," continued my Lord, turning to Celia: "we met in the library of my friend Townly."

Celia recollected the circumstance, and she said so.

"You have quitted London at a very prominent period," said my Lord; "there are to be two or three splendid fetes in the course of this month."

"I knew this," said Celia; "but I considered that I had lost some rural scenes by my protracted stay, and was unfashionable enough to pine for home."

"The season of fashion is greatly changed," said Mrs. Mansfield: "when I was a young woman, the birth-day closed a London career, and the town was absolutely deserted after that day; but now, the beauties of the spring, the luxuriance of summer, are the contemplations only of the rustic world, with a few exceptions; and the days are absolutely waning into autumn, tumn, ere the children of dissipation seek its vivifying influence."

"They have no taste for the charms of nature," said Lord Ellincourt.

"Green fields, and shady groves, and crystal springs,
And larks, and nightingales, are odious things;
But smoke, and dust, and noise, and crowds delight,
And to be pressed to death transports them quite."

"It is a fearful vortex," said Mrs. Mansfield; "health and peace are its sacrifices."

"Even more than these are offered at its shrine," said my Lord, rising in visible agitation.

"You will take your coffee with us, my Lord?" said Mrs. Mansfield.

"Not to-night, my dear Madam," he replied; "you will, perhaps, find me troublesome, but you must tell me so. Some men may be pardoned, if they cannot draw a line in a case which offers such a solace to a widowed heart"—and taking Edward by the hand, Lord Ellincourt retired.

"My allusion was unfortunate," said Mrs.

Mrs. Mansfield, "it touched my Lord sensibly; he is yet smarting under his unmerited disgrace—I like his manners—there is much to admire in this man, Celia."

"His parental character charms me," said Celia, "it is so consistent with my ideas of a father's feelings; yet these feelings must enhance his misery: what frequent and painful recurrences must he own!—if ever woman was censurable, Lady Ellincourt is so."

"True, my love," replied Mrs. Mansfield; "but there is danger in judging too closely." Celia blushed. "I do not presume to extenuate the conduct of such a woman, nor would I in any case influence your opinions; but I really think my Lord a man of such persuasive manners, that we must be cautious in admitting the prepossession too implicitly, lest it should make us severe, where you have avowed there is arcady seated the sure and certain consequences of a moral defection."

Celia received this admonition with that respect respect which all Mrs. Mansfield's sentiments demanded; yet her heart was less prone to qualify the errors of Lady Ellincourt than those of any other seceding mortal whatever. "To abandon such a family!" sighed Celia, as she retired to her chamber, "to quit a man so evidently amiable!" and her active fancy contrasted the deserted husband with all those men with whom she had mixed. "Belford is an intellectual, a pleasing companion, honourable, generous, and sincere—his discernment is that of a superior mind," thought the reflective Celia; "yet his decisions bear the appearance of severity, of an imperious foresight, calculated rather to awe than to sooth. Lord Ellincourt was a mere trusting mortal, pure in himself, and believing in those whom he loved. And what am I?" said Celia, after a pause; "even more presumptuous than him whom I have judged. I am depreciating a being whom it is virtue to esteem, and exalting one of whom I as yet know little." Again intrusive memory recalled recalled the words of Mrs. Welgrave; and she retired to her pillow, in the full persuasion that her censure was reprehensible, while her involuntary praise must be correct; for Mrs. Welgrave had sanctioned the impression, and she was the woman whose opinions were invaluable to Celia.

Next morning brought Lord Ellincourt to the dwelling of Celia. It had occurred to him that Miss Delacour could give him some intelligence, which he was anxious to attain. There are few circumstances which add more to friendship, than a mutual knowledge of each other's friends. My Lord wished to know if Mr. Belford had expressed any intention of visiting Warwickshire? "I now conclude that it was to you, my Lord, whom Mr. Belford alluded, when he bade me expect to see him (though not immediately) in the neighbourhood of Hadley."

Lord Ellincourt explained, and Celia was led to converse of the amiable Belford. "Few men possess more discernment," said my my Lord; "he is sometimes called severe, but it is the severity of virtue—he has seen much of life, and has a proportioned contempt for its follies—yet no man is more lenient, where compassion should be accorded—nay, I have known him, with all the courage of a great mind, stand forward to reclaim a basking child of error—he would have drawn aside the deceiving veil, but she ——in fact," continued Lord Ellincourt, "there is an egotism in error, and we seldom reject even our crimes, till we have exhausted our fallacious theory," and he leaned thoughtfully on his hand for some moments.

"Mrs. Welgrave expected to meet you in London," continued Lord Ellincourt, addressing Celia.

My Lord spoke of many with whom Celia had mixed—his opinions seemed the revision

revision of her feelings. "For my own part," said Lord Ellincourt, in his closing remark, "I can by no means consider a town life what it is represented; at least, its influence can only bind those whose treasures are in its sphere; and then I must believe that their mutual honour should make them taste the stream together—but when we merely migrate for a few months, when we carry with us fixed principles, and a determination, at the same time, of seeking only amusement, the reflections that it shall hereafter produce may prove of real advantage."

"I agree with you, my Lord," said Mrs. Mansfield; "and though we sometimes hear of sudden subversion of principles, for which that hydra-headed monster, the world, is made wholly accountable, I cannot believe it possible—the world may dazzle a novice, but never yet destroyed, but where some radical defect lent its aid; either our weakness or our vanity marks us as its prey. How beautifully has Milton expressed this!" said Mrs. Mansfield. "Speaking of man, he says—

> ——————"Within himself
> The danger lies, yet lies within his power;
> Against his will he can receive no harm:
> Reason is free, and reason he made right."

"Milton, of all poets, is my favourite," said my Lord; "yet I know not," and he sighed, "that I could be exonerated from vanity in my attachment to his verse—he has touched my heart by his record of early error, where, though the woman suffers, the man, even in dishonour in his fallen state, yet preserves the soul of man, the nice, the tenacious feeling of a heart, that on its generous confidence relied."

"You have well called it vanity," said Mrs. Mansfield, with a smile; "but there are degrees of vanity, and I am persuaded your's is not of the worst class."

"I trust not," said Ellincourt; "but you, Miss Delacour, will not you consider me as a self-assured egotist, one ready to condemn others, and equally prone to extenuate his own failings?"

"I have heard of you, my Lord," said Celia, "through a medium liberal as I believe you to deserve;" and the blushes that rose on her cheek, as she beheld the effect of her brief yet flattering eulogium, caused her to pause—"that is," continued Celia, with a playful smile, "I made some allowances for the partial portraiture."

"I will prove my humility," said my Lord, "by henceforth trusting to the colouring of friendship;" and the tranquil expression which beamed on his expressive features, seemed to Mrs. Mansfield not merely the effect of gratitude for the favour of those friends, but a soothing and more efficient meed in the unaffected record just elicited.

Celia owned an oppressive feeling at her heart—she believed that her candour, though it had induced an unguarded truth, was yet too unqualified perhaps; for some feelings are indescribably attenuated—she feared to trust her voice again. Fortunately, the little family from the Lodge were now seen coming through the grounds, drawn in a low vehicle by Robson and Edward. She fled to meet them, and left Lord Ellincourt with her aunt.

My Lord advanced to the window—he watched Celia as she joined his children —he saw the little creatures share the envied kiss, while Edward took the arm of Celia, and with conscious pride seemed to feel his confidence in her particular favour.

"These graceful traits of character in your charming niece," said Lord Ellincourt, addressing Mrs. Mansfield, "are to my children comforts invaluable; but their father, my dear Madam, forgive me when I say, he could not see them with the philosophy of friendship.—I knew I was to see an amiable woman, whenever I should meet Miss Delacour, and I now recollect a little ambiguity in my cousin Welgrave, who, when I named you as the obliging friend who who had interested herself in the health of my Harriet, was just to your virtues, yet evidently tenacious of saying too much; yes, I see she was desirous that I should not know Miss Delacour was your niece—in fact, that there was such a bliss in my reach, as an intercourse with this too charming girl.

> Holds on the same, from woman to begin."

"I would not solicit you to woo a danger which you consider so formidable," said Mrs. Mansfield, smiling; "yet are you not premature, my Lord? My niece is by no means so attractive as many with whom you might associate—her chief charm is the simplicity of her character, and that, in the present day, is not a quality to endanger the peace of man."

"Of some men," replied Ellincourt. "I will not resign my permission; yet Mrs. Welgrave has, with her usual sweetness, made me acquainted with your niece in idea, has related a thousand instances of her superiority over those of her age—she has passed the ordeal of London criticism—been sought and addressed by many aspiring suitors—has felt her own worth, in rejecting some, whom I know to be (according to the suffrages of rank) desirable connections—she has, in spite of satire, and general custom, forborne to waste her bloom in midnight orgies—retired, when all that wit and ridicule could aim, was pointed at her to thwart her purpose—and one proof of feminine virtue, of angelic sympathy, was poured on my ear, that exalts her above woman, I had almost said; yes, Madam, I do not blush to own that I wept over the character of Celia in idea; and I have met her, either to wear out my life in secret regrets, or to be ——what she never could accept," said Lord Ellincourt, and taking his hat, he hurried into the grounds.

Mrs. Mansfield was thoughtful—she saw, in this interesting husband, those graces of mind mind and person peculiarly calculated to win a retired woman; and had Lord Ellincourt been free to chuse, no man would have been more acceptable to her, as the husband of Celia—to have given to the motherless children a mother, whose heart she knew would have been consistent with the philanthropy of her heart; but Lady Ellincourt yet lived;—"and Heaven grant her life," said Mrs. Mansfield, mentally—"and he may he perfect the repentance of this greatly erring woman!"

"Who desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he may turn from his wickedness, and live,"

Lord Ellincourt pursued the track of the carriage, till, on arriving at a rustic arbour, he found Celia, with the children seated around her, busily employed in making nosegays.

"Here is heart's-ease for you, papa," said Edward, giving the humble floweret to his father.—My Lord took the offering.

"This boy," said he, "is already a sentimental friend," and he placed the flower in his bosom.

"In a child, the charm is attractive," replied Celia; "yet the feeling in one so young is a gloomy promise, my Lord; for I am persuaded human happiness is greatly diminished, by too keen feelings."

"And what is human happiness without sentiment?" asked my Lord.—"What would you place in lieu of this precious meed, so pleasant in our sorrows—so graceful in our joys?"

Celia was forming a reply, when a servant, with little George in her arms, passed the avenue. Our heroine held out her hand, and the child showed impatience to come to her.

"To what feeling does that child owe his present protection?" asked Lord Ellincourt.

Celia blushed.—"My Lord!"

"I need no explanation," he continued. "I am informed——Only say what gave him to your care?"

"Huma-

"Humanity," said Celia, "compassion for his unprotected innocence."

"And what is compassion, humanity, sympathy—what are these but sentiment?" asked my Lord.—"There is in feelings, as in language, the positive, the comparative, and the superlative. The two first are that common impulse of nature, inseparable, I trust, from every rational being. In the latter case, the feeling is ennobled—it becomes sentiment, pure, irresistible sentiment—a colouring which gives to feminine deeds a grace beyond the reach of art."

"You are an enthusiast, I fear," said Celia, smiling."

"And why do you fear it?" said Lord Ellincourt.

"Because such a character is, of all others, most open to imposition. In fact, it is a dangerous possession of an ingenuous mind, and none but an ingenuous mind owns the possession."

"You are a dangerous casuist," said Lord Ellincourt, in a musing attitude.—"An

"An enthusiast is easily deceived. Yes, I have been deceived—cruelly deceived—Witness those deserted babes.—You have heard my sorrowing tale," he added.—"The power of your sex is invincible;—'tis grievous, when they use it but to destroy."

"Condemn not all for one," said Celia.

"Heaven forbid!" said Lord Ellincourt. "You will—yes, I am assured you will make allowances for a man situated as I am. Could you have seen that home which once was mine, you would not wonder that my wounded heart turns from the halcyon scene with bitterest reflection; nor could you blame me for my present feelings."

That indiscriminate adulation which Celia had experienced during her residence in London, had qualified her to judge appropriately on the hyperbolical system;—it had often assailed her ears, but never touched her heart. Lord Ellincourt was a new acquaintance—yet his character, from its peculiar cast, was one which rather made its interest by an imposing candour, than sought it by the progressive association of mind;—or rather, might we not say that congenial minds distance time, and that the heart may be far gone in the mazes of sentiment, ere the trembling fugitive has considered the path? It must be so—for Lord Ellincourt already loved Celia; and, strange to tell, Celia, in less than a month from their first meeting, had discovered in my Lord all those qualities which she estimated;—she had learned to love him, in his children, and this, she imagined, would be the extent of her feelings, as applied to Lord Ellincourt; but when she beheld him in the graceful character of a father, when she heard him instructing his children—teaching the young idea how to shoot—"This then is the father for whom I have looked," said Celia; "and it is such a husband I could worship;—and he, good Heavens! he is dishonoured!—Infatuated, cruel woman!" she sighed, "had my fate been been thus cast—yes, Ellincourt, I could love you—but it cannot be."

That reserve inseparable from a delicate passion, made Celia and Lord Ellincourt mutually miserable. At one moment he believed her an amiable friend; in the next, there was something captious in her character; yet he never thought of relinquishing her society. No, he would watch over, and endeavour to understand her disposition. Celia trembled beneath his gaze—her bosom treasured his sentiments, and her nerves——Good Heavens! what am I saying? I have acknowledged myself a female scribbler—and, in truth, I am writing like a very woman;—but the women will not forgive me; they will say I am betraying what ought to be concealed. I am a sceptic in all worldly deceptions. I believe that the men would——.

"Tush! what signifies your opinions," says the reader; "the story was just getting ting interesting, and you break in upon us with your reflections;—we shall have them divided under three heads presently."

Love bears various definitions, my gentle readers; and I might tell you of Celia's love, in language multiform.—I might, with Shakespeare, say—"She wore him in her heart;"—I might quote the tender Shenstone, and avow—

"That she found keen anguish, ev'ry rose devour;"

or I might simply assert, what, to a domestic woman, is more applicable, that Celia was now so much a slave, that the approach of Ellincourt, though perhaps her ardent wish deranged her untaught feelings, that "His very foot has music in't,

As he comes up the stairs."

Above a month had stolen on, and my Lord was astonished to find the days closing in. The manor-house, now partially visible visible from the Lodge, was beginning to lose its foliage—and once or twice a cheerful fire had beamed in the spacious cedar-parlour. However justly our gratitude may be excited, by the contemplation of nature in her varied scenes, I have always thought, that those comforts, which the ingenuity and art of man has devised for our convenience, are highly worthy of our consideration; thus I never find myself in a room, secured from the inclemencies of the season, furnished with all that is useful, and, above all, inhabited by some one of those I esteem, that my heart does not imperiously tell me,

Were we but grateful, and willing to see things as they are, we should be a more "acceptable people."

"Why it is perfect happiness with which this eccentric being asks us to be content," says my readers. How many of you possess it—yet pine for more! and how many many want the whole, and languish for your aid, and you heed them not!

It was one chilly evening, in the early part of September, that Lord Ellincourt entered the cedar-room at Hadley; he held a letter in his hand, and, as he asked the forgiveness of Celia, he declared that he had withheld it since morning, that he might have the pleasure of delivering it personally.

"It is from Lady Townly, and enclosed to my care, by a lover of your's," said my Lord, "and it has passed into the hands of another—and a despairing wretch," he added, in a low voice.

Celia took the offered epistle; and while her cheek owned the mantling blush, her trembling fingers scarce retained the letter.

"Put the chess-board ready, Celia," said Mrs. Mansfield.—"Lord Ellincourt and I will amuse ourselves, while you read your letter."

Celia

Celia sat down to peruse the epistle of her sister.

"Any news?" asked Mrs. Mansfield, as she saw Celia smile.

"Quite a budget," said Celia, and in her usual strain of gaiety.

"Give us such parts as you can," said Mrs. Mansfield.

Celia complied, and soon after read as follows:—

"We had a charming squeeze at Desmond's last night;—my carriage was an hour getting up; and though Danbury and Quadrige assured me there was not standing room, I was resolved on venturing.—Only conceive how silly it would have been to give it up, when I had invented one of the most elegant dresses you ever saw!—but I wont describe it; you will get it in the ——— next month, and my lovely portrait into the bargain. It is highly amusing to me, when I see these elegant specimens of art. I actually remember to have seen the same head exhibited bited in a magazine for three or four persons; but if they should dare to put a Hebe-like wig upon the portrait of old Snowdon, alias Bridoon, who was exhibited last month as the beautiful Lady Bridoon, I shall seize my pen, dip it in gall, and write—gods! how I shall write!"

"What an idea!" said Mrs. Mansfield.—"Standing-room at a private party, as it is called. Fanny's spirits are excellent—Does she say any thing of Townly and the child?"

Celia proceeded.—"We are going to leave this naughty town.—Harry has taken a ferme ornée, which I am not to see, until I go to take up my abode in it. How delightful is such a surprise!—Entre nous, there is something very gallant in this, after a woman has been married nearly eight years. Apropos"—and here our heroine paused.

Lord Ellincourt raised his eyes, and regarded Celia attentively. She was silent for some minutes. Again referring to her letter, she added—" Rachel is making rapid advances—I quite love this good Lucy—tell aunt Mansfield so. As to Harry, he is so grateful, and so proud, and so every thing, that I am almost tempted to promise you the honour of our company, en famille, at Christmas; just to let some people see what they could not believe, but by ocular demonstration. I already anticipate, that Rachel will be, not a Lucilla, nor an apish Desmond, nor a chilling Frost, but my dear Celia's own——."—And again there was a break ; and our heroine, folding her Ladyship's letter, declared there was little more in its contents than what she had read.

Lord Ellincourt smiled.—" You will allow us to draw what inference we choose from the last passage," said he.—" Lady Townly is wise—she has had time to contrast the advantages of her sister, and will evince both her duty and discernment, in forming her daughter on so fair a model."

" You will teach me to doubt you, if your-your compliments are so prominent, my Lord," said Celia.

"Yet I know not that our friend deserves this rebuke, Celia," said Mrs. Mansfield.—"For those advantages which Nature bestows, we should be grateful without vanity, for they are perishable, and, in fact, not our own:—when we have improved the gracious gift, we deserve praise. I see your surprise, Celia; but do not we justly condemn the being who neglects to cultivate his understanding? Then why withhold praise, when we have done our part.—Nay, I really think qualified praise is at once a gracious meed, and, to mere human nature, an almost necessary incitement."

"It is impossible, in some cases, to speak even as we feel," said Lord Ellincourt.—"Nay, Miss Delacour would wholly impeach me, were I to expatiate on this subject—I must forbear, in her presence; but amidst the anguish that has, and will, I fear, continue to embitter my life, I have been looking anxiously to some system of education, distinct from the present times, and I have found it. Here will I remain; and, until either my presumption makes me troublesome, or my fears are realized, I must occasionally sip from the source, and behold the perfection of my aspiring hopes. Already my girls have learned to decide on what is right, by one reference only.—'Celia says it is naughty;'—or, 'Celia says it is good.'—Nay, I sat silently observing them yesterday;—they differed about a chair, which both wanted, yet neither would yield. At length, after a little time, Julia bade Emma take it.—'You are the youngest,' said she.—'How foolish I was not to give it you! Come and kiss me, Emma;—for Celia says, if we don't "Love one another," God will not love us.' They were instantly reconciled. How grateful did I feel at that moment!" continued my Lord.—"How soothing was the conviction, that they already comprehended an infinite protector, a God whose favour they were anxious to gain; and if I owned a reference, could it be wondered?" added Lord Ellincourt, rising; "I did—and I ask you to forgive me, if it was wrong.—Adieu."

"Celia," said Mrs. Mansfield, after a pause, "Ellincourt loves you. Give me your confidence, my dear child; there is no reason against your receiving him as a lover, save one. Does that one appear irreconcileable to your feelings?"

"Ah! my dear Madam," said Celia, "Lord Ellincourt is not a man to be seen with indifference. I fear he has already too strong an interest in my heart."

"You are but half ingenuous," replied Mrs. Mansfield, with an encouraging smile.

"I cannot say more," said Celia; and placing Lady Townly's letter in the hands of her aunt, she hastily withdrew.

CHAP. VIII.

"This woman, whom thou mad'st to be my help,
And gav'st me as thy perfect gift, so good,
So fit, so acceptable, so divine,
That from her hand I could suspect no ill."

A MAN should either be silent, or wholly explicit. It may have a good stage effect, to break off with an appropriate pathos;—but there is usually one person in an audience, who is the sport of this interesting derangement. If any man could be excused a rehearsal of this sort, we would recommend Lord Ellincourt to the favour of an indulgent public. Loving Celia with all his heart, he yet feared that she would not accept him, under the peculiar circumstances of his fate; yet he resolved on knowing that fate, in all its varied bearings. Though a man should be as free from from vanity as good sense can make him, his eyes will be open to certain indications of favour;—a woman neither blushes at the approach of a stranger, nor is any thing but eloquent in the presence of a man to whom she is indifferent. These are symbols of preference, on which a reasonable man may build; but if she is anxious for your safety—if she sees the coming storm, and would guard you from its violence—if she thought of you when she was in danger, take comfort—she loves you—but be grateful. Alas! should she love you all the days of her life, the term is short. Half a thousand such tendernesses had elicited themselves in the manner of our heroine to Lord Ellincourt, yet he dared not hope. Once he had trusted, but now, with the disappointed moralist, the pensively eloquent Young, he might have said—

Lean not on earth, 'twill pierce thee to the heart;
A broken reed at best; but oft a spear;
On its sharp point peace bleeds, and hope expires."

All this had Lord Ellincourt owned; yet again he loved, and he fled to the manor-house, to seek Celia, and tell her so.—"If she rejects me," said he, as he entered the elm walk, now strewed with the curling leaves of autumn, "I must yet love her—nature is fading," and he turned to survey the extended scene, "and I may soon fall. With Celia life owns every charm—without her, I must yet remember I am a father," said my Lord, when, on turning the avenue, he beheld the object of his ruminations advancing.—"It is spring yet," said Lord Ellincourt, as he drew the arm of Celia through his.—"You are going to walk—may I attend you?"

Celia could not, at that moment, find a reply, yet my Lord continued to lead her on.—"Yes, I, with all the weak pinings of discontented man, was regretting the fallen leaves, and moralizing even to sadness, when you, Celia, like another spring, broke on my sight, and bade me to be grateful."

The

The eyes of Celia met those of Ellincourt—she feared her secret was known.—My Lord smiled.—"Proud girl," said he, "you have not been too lenient;—no, I did not thank you, but Heaven; for though you should doom me to despair, I yet must hug my chains, and thank that Providence which gives you to my sight."

"My Lord, indeed I must not listen to you," said Celia, withdrawing her arm.

"Why not?" asked Ellincourt.—"Tell me candidly, why you must not listen to the man who adores you?"

"Are you not already married?" said Celia, and her trembling frame seemed sinking to the earth.

"Hear me," said Ellincourt, as he again placed her arm on his.—"If you considered me free, would you hesitate to give me this hand?"

"Assuredly not," said Celia, with modest firmness.

"Generous, amiable woman," said Lord Ellincourt, "believe me grateful for this candour; candour; but, Celia, those scruples will yield. Reflect on this seeming barrier to our happiness;—it is not the law of man, the mere bugbear to keep one class in awe, and extend another's licence; it is a law founded from earliest antiquity, with due consideration for the honour of man. Its record is in that book, from whence all "wisdom proceedeth." Your life, my beloved Celia, is guided by the tenets of that book; and would you seek a cause so remote, so unsupported, as that in question, to rob me of happiness? All that is revealed was revealed for our advancement—for our imitation. Let me not enter into a detail, from which I would gladly turn.—Tell me, that I may hope that you do not decidedly give me over to despair, and I will bear your decision."

"This hand," said Celia, placing it on that of my Lord, "is your's.—If I am not your wife, I will not marry at all:—I see invincible objections; nor can I wish them done away—Let us meet as friends, my Lord;—

Lord;—let us forget this elucidation, and——"

"You could not forget it, Celia," said Lord Ellincourt, with a reproachful glance; "you could not rescind the only pleasurable feeling that has touched this heart for one long year."

"Is it so long?" asked Celia, with all the naïveté of her character.

"Yes, it is a year since I was abandoned," said my Lord, in a voice nearly suffocated by emotion.

"Forgive me," said Celia; "but I wonder, yet I believe you perceive your security, or I would wonder that you again trusted in woman."

"Ingenuous, charming girl!" said Lord Ellincourt, as he folded the guileless Celia to his heart, "there are many women, but few Celias."

Now, the question is, whether Love blinded my Lord, or that Celia was really superior to Lady Ellincourt? A short sketch shall suffice; for, as I have said before, episodes neither excite my admiration or are my forte.

Lord Ellincourt, at the age of three-and-twenty, had given his hand to a young and beautiful woman, in a rank of life much below his own. In fact, Emma Lesly was the daughter of an officer, who had fallen in the service of his country, and with her mother, "feeble, old, and poor," lived in a cottage "far retired." Chance threw Lord Ellincourt in her way; he was captivated by her person; and, extraordinary as it may appear, never for a moment harboured a thought prejudicial to her honour. She was poor—what of that? my Lord was rich, and he had always been considered an eccentric creature: he had dared, even at college, to think for himself; had never been laughed out of virtue into vice—in fact, he, with Emma Lesly in his hand, approached the altar of his God, with a heart as pure as love and honour could make it. Emma was grateful; she adored my Lord, and she believed it was for himself. They retired into

Wales,

Wales, where, for two years, a fairied scene of bliss was theirs. She had buried her mother, but Heaven had blessed her with two children, Edward and Julia. The Castle of Ellincourt was retired. Emma began to wish that her splendour could be seen; and she tempted my Lord, in an evil hour, to let her visit London. They came; and it was then that Lady Ellincourt began to exist. She was admired, for she was natural; she was soothed, for she was young, and a stranger to the world: yet happiness was her's; she was guided by my Lord in everything; her cards, as Lady Townly had said, were always inspected by my Lord; he attended her everywhere; and she was grateful and blessed in his assiduities. Years glided away, and she made her annual appearance in London. Harriet was born; and my Lord thought that she lingered in the fallacious sphere.

However we may be termed cynical, it is is a fact, that every year elicits something new in the annals of folly; in truth,

"Quæ fuerunt vitia, mores sunt."

Forgive me, courteous reader; this is a trait à la Lucilla—in plain English then,

"What once were vices, are now the manners of the day."

It was outré to be seen with a husband; it was fashionable to be dashing, and fascinating, and animated. Lady Ellincourt possessed youth, beauty, and riches: then she was the creature to lead. The ladies laughed at her Lord; the men reviled him, but they pitied her; and Sir Frederic Milner, who had lived in foreign countries, who had seen the world, and practised the system of a libertine, declared her Ladyship's fate to be cruel.

Emma took courage, on the assertion of Sir Frederic; she issued her cards, unknown to my Lord; her house was filled agreeably to to the "usage of society;" and her husband was the only disappointed person of the party. He expostulated next morning; she was deaf; she had been advised not to hold any argument. Lord Ellincourt was peremptory; he demanded why she had dissented from her usual manners?

"My dear Berkley," said Lady Ellincourt, "you are becoming quite morose; really, my dear fellow, we have been such turtles, that our friends absolutely laugh at us: give me a little liberty; I will be a very good girl—nay, you should prove my love."

And here might not Lord Ellincourt have quoted his favourite Milton?—

Safest and seemliest by her husband stays,
Who guards her, or with her the worst endures."

Again,

"Not diffident of thee do I dissuade
Thy absence from my sight, but to avoid Th' attempt itself.
* * * * * * *

For

For he who tempts, though in vain, at least asperses
The attempted with dishonour foul, supposed
Not incorruptible of faith, not proof
* * * * * * * *
Misdeem not then, if such affront I labour to avert," said my Lord; at least, such were the tenor of his words.

But Emma was intoxicated; she vowed she loved my Lord, but he had not confidence in her, and she wept soft pearly tears.

"Alas!——————————
——————————trial will come unsought:
Wouldst thou approve thy constancy, approve
First thy obedience; the other who can know?
Not seeing thee attempted, who attest?
But if thou think, trial unsought may find Us both securer than thus warn'd thou seem'st, Go; for thy stay, not free, absents thee more."

And this she did. It was some months ere the dreadful truth reached the injured Ellincourt.—I would not have it understood, gentle reader, that Lady Ellincourt was left to to seek her ruin—no; my Lord expostulated, entreated, and at length ordered the travelling carriage to be at the door next morning. The carriage came; but Lady Ellincourt had flown, had abandoned her adoring husband and innocent babes, for the precarious protection of a libertine. The effect on my Lord was that of transient insanity, and for near a month he was incapable of bearing the sight of his children. In this time, Mrs. Welgrave became his comfort; she calmed his returning reason; she besought him to let her error be her punishment. My Lord paused; he would first offer her the power to be virtuous; he would tell her where to find a home, though not with him. He did this. His letter remained unanswered; and the law severed that union which Love's silken fetters had wove. And here let me observe, that Lady Ellincourt was not of that class to whom immorality is attached. It is illiberal to apply it specifically. Immorality flourishes where education is neglected glected—where a great many flowers are collected, much of our vital air is destroyed —collected streams form an ocean, and is there not a collision of mind? Assuredly there is; and the intellectual collision educes the harmony of social intercourse, the ore without dross; and when the light, the frivolous, the accomplished, rather than the informed, make a phalanx, what do we expect—what ought we to expect?—Exactly what occurs—the history of the times present.

It is already known to our readers, that Lady Ellincourt is now Lady Milner. The injured husband had retired from the sphere of his misery, to a villa belonging to Belford. Castle Ellincourt was once a paradise; but it was now to him a lost paradise—he could not return to it, and after some months, the Lodge became the residence of the deserted little family. Thus much for the love, marriage, and divorce of Lord Ellincourt.

It is now, beyond a doubt, known to my my readers, that Miss Delacour's "search of a husband" is over; but there must be difficulties in all love affairs, and this formidable divorce was, to Celia, an imperious barrier. Mrs. Mansfield saw the matter in a different point of view.—"It was a decree sanctioned by that religion of which she was a devout believer," and she bade Celia to consider this.

It is most grateful to a leaning heart, when its secret feelings are anticipated; it gives us confidence—we must be right; and we willingly forego the delight of having elicited our skill or genius at invention, because our inclination has already flown out, and we are the creatures of sympathetic friendship, even at the moment that we are the trembling victims of a concealed passion.

The arrows of Love, when shot in the circle of fashionable life, must certainly meet an opposition that blunts their genuine intent—is it that the urchin is an enemy to hot rooms, and effulgent glare? The archer is, we know, represented blind, but the intelligence of the little deity is wonderful; thus we scarce meet a record of permanent bliss effected in this heterogeneous sphere. Alas! it is not to love, but levity, that these lamentable defections must be imputed.

The men are——

A truce for the present; I will say something to them before I take my leave.

It is so uninteresting to describe love scenes, it is impossible to please all, I am actually timid in offering a scene of this sort, to the eye of my readers;—and a love-letter! I would not venture such a thing for the world.

Suffice it to say, that the day stole on, and the intercourse between the families was strengthened, as their mutual tastes were unfolded, when one evening, while Celia was employed in reading to Mrs. Mansfield, Lord Ellincourt and Mr. Belford were announced. Celia fled to meet her respected friend. My Lord paused as he beheld her zeal, and a blush rose on his cheek; cheek; he threw himself on a chair by the side of Mrs. Mansfield, and for a moment sat silent.

"How are the children?" asked Celia, turning to my Lord; "I expected them all the morning."

"It was 'black Monday,' Celia," said my Lord, taking her hand. "A perverse spirit had intruded amongst us, and I was forced to detain them at home."

"You were lenient, I trust," said Celia.

"You must judge to-morrow," said my Lord, in a low voice.

Celia promised, and the conversation became general.

"You have delayed your visit much beyond what you purposed," said Celia, addressing Belford.

"Various causes occurred to prevent my intent," said Belford; "and compassion was not least prominent."

Celia blushed; there was no mistaking the allusion.

Mrs. Mansfield declared the avowal was strictly in unison with her idea of Mr. Belford's character—" I have often felt that I owe you much, Sir; your attention to my novice was highly useful."

" I must differ with you, Madam," said Belford. " Miss Delacour wanted no guide; her own judgment is her security. I have seen many women as lovely, numbers more accomplished, but not one so judicious—so rational—so fixed in principles: yet she has left an odd sort of character behind her," said Belford, smiling.

" Come, give us the portrait without touching up," said Lord Ellincourt. " Your camera obscura is always highly amusing."

" Well, Lord Quadrige remembers Miss Delacour as a divine girl, whose figure was admirably calculated for tragedy; he has wept, with rapture, over the delightful verses of the said lady, addressed to Rachel Townly in her nursery; and is persuaded that the fair poetess sipped the soft numbers from the silver Avon; nay, I really believe he is designing a jubilee, that shall bring bring a famine into your neighbourhood. I would advise you to defeat the intent by some ostensible opposition," said Belford, with an ambiguous smile.

"Proceed," said Lord Ellincourt.

"Ellincourt reminds me of an affected author," continued Belford; "he would willingly appear liberal, yet he will apply all that I shall say to himself; nay, I should not wonder if the record remained with him, while she to whom it is applied will not retain a sentence of it."

"No annotations," said my Lord.

Belford proceeded—"Danbury, who owes Quadrige a grudge ever since the whisker business, has been active in traducing him. 'You do not think, my dear Belford,' said my little Russian friend, 'that Miss Delacour can possibly mean to receive the addresses of Quadrige; he is confoundedly poor—all the timber on his estate would not pay his debts.'—'Perhaps he has an eye to the Hadley oaks,' said I.'—'No, my dear fellow,' said the beau; 'I own I was a little curious at first, for, in fact, there are so many impositions put upon us poor devils, that we are justified in being circumspect: but Miss Delacour, by Heaven, she is an angel! and I would defy Bridoon himself to run such an equipage as I will start, when once I can get the dear creature to listen to me.'—'She does not care a button for you,' said I; 'not a buck's button, nor a set of buttons.' Danbury looked grave—'She will not give her hand to Berton,' said he, after a pause; 'no, she is too moral for that: yet, between ourselves, Belford, that was a sad deviation of the divine Celia's; it is well she has cash, or the matter would have been differently translated."

"We must make some allowance for the gaiety of Mr. Belford," said Celia, turning to her aunt; "he has a happy way of satirizing the follies of the prominent."

"Why, dear Madam," rejoined Belford, "however you may have been deceived, few women have been more conspicuous in in their first visit to London than your niece. All young ladies are known to be looking for husbands, upon the simple principle, I presume, of its being in nature to want what we do not possess; for, Heaven knows, husbands are by no means the lasting treasures of women."

Lord Ellincourt sighed.

"This cold-hearted Celia," added Belford, "has refused a nobleman coachman and a whiskered beau; she has been indifferent to the sighs of a lordly poet, and half a thousand others whom I could enumerate: yet she was known to be in 'search of a husband.' What must we infer?" said Belford; "either that she has resolved on a life of single blessedness, or is she yet in 'search of a husband?"

Celia's cheeks were suffused with blushes.

Lord Ellincourt took her hand. "My dear Belford," said the Peer, "I know your heart, but you will not love Celia's husband less when you behold him in your friend.

friend. Yes, Celia will be mine;" and he led the agitated Celia towards Belford.

"I saw this," said Belford, as he relinquished that hand which Celia had presented to him: "yes, here I knew you would decide—and it was wise," he continued: "even I must do justice to your discernment: this, my dear Berkley, bears all the promise that a sublunary state dare hope—you will not seek retirement from satiety, but choice—you will not fear the giddy vortex, for ye are not the creatures of the day; it is for a home, such as Celia would make—in fact, it is from Celia herself, that all my plans of domestic happiness took rise: it is no matter how a man of my age has arrived at that age unmarried; the truth might evince his vanity, but it could not impeach his principles. You will be happy, and you deserve it; and most sincerely shall I rejoice in it."

Mrs. Mansfield was pleased by the ingenuous

nuous manner of Belford; nor did the gentlemen retire until it was late.

When a London party breaks up, we own no anxiety for the manner in which they get away—if they are of any rank, their carriages are in waiting; we say nothing of those dinner-hunting bucks, who pick their way over the flags, and escape at night, nobody knows how; yet I cannot forbear saying, that I have frequently smiled at these beaux, with their formidable opera-hats; nay the hat altogether is my aversion—it is vilely unbecoming—it gives a meagre appearance to the figure; and I never see one of these odious caricaturish things, even on a good figure, that the words of Shakespeare do not occur to my mind—

"The lean and slipper'd pantaloon."

Enough of opera-hats.—But I was saying, when our visitors depart in London, we care nothing as to how they get home; it it is quite a different thing in the country —the night is dark, and there are mole-hills and ant-hills; and when a man leaves his heart behind him, he is very likely to stumble,, for the eyes of a heartless man are generally (when absent from their worship) turned inwards. Now Celia saw much to fear in my Lord's returning to the Lodge so late; again she recollected Belford was with him, and she took comfort. "How perfect, how distinctly are my feelings influenced in favour of this man!" said Celia, mentally; "this, surely, is not what is called the illusion of love—there is nothing light in the character of Ellincourt; he is moral, yet chearful—religious, without ostentation; he is strict in his family, and gives them an example in his own rectitude; he is a tender father, without the blindness of a father; he is not prone to praise his children for such simple acts as natural affection dictates, while he is equally attentive to encourage the ripening thought, and tenderly grateful ful for such marks of duty as they evince." In short, Celia loved him, and she thought him perfect. We write of him, and we believe him so, or we would not have selected him as the husband of Celia. It would have been easy to pourtray a character more highly wrought, more great, more wise, more every thing; but I hate wonders—we have wonderful bucks, wonderful boxers, and wonderful pedestrians; these are the aim of ——, and any —— may reach the goal. Lord Ellincourt was a rational, moderate man; if his feelings were sometimes too intense, remember he had been deceived; and a deceived heart may be forgiven, if it should own a little tenacity.

I am persuaded that a novel, though it may be a presumptive mirror, is generally considered a false glass: there may be some justice in the remark; but while I allow this, I think it is possible they may prove serviceable: but there must be evident traits of nature in the casting of the characters;

we must not frighten by the gloom of our best man in the piece; the hero may be amiable, without despondency; just to himself, without judging others; in fact,

"La morale trop austere se fait moins aimer, qu'elle ne se fait craindre: et qui veut qu'on profite de ses leçons, donner envie de les entendre."

And such a man, we presume to think, we have allotted to Celia as a husband.

For my own part, I would recommend to the ladies in "search of a husband," to endeavour at transporting the creature into the country, for if he should be volatile, and given to change, the opportunities are less; and if marriage is actually the order of the day, it is astonishing with what superior facility these things are ordered in the country. I firmly believe it is the usage of society which destroys this presto-like arrangement in London; in fact, one's friends expect favours, and the tradespeople are so tardy: now in the country, it is the poor who expect our favours (and they they would share the term friendship in modern times), and they are so easily pleased, and we are made so happy by their unaffected gratitude, that, for my part, I would sooner pay my vows in a village-church, than offer my heart through the mediation of a bishop. Thus much for simple feelings, plebeian opinions.

The manner and period for this most interesting epoch in the life of woman, had been digested between the parties at the Lodge and manor-house.

Belford, with all the tenderness of exalted friendship, was to bestow the precious gift upon his friend.

Celia asked the silence of those whom she loved, until her fate was decided: she knew the character of her sister, and anticipated the badinage to which she should be subjected, while the matter rested on perishable time; when it was past recal, her vivacity would blend in her congratulations, and Celia would be spared a mental uneasiness.

Behold

Behold Celia Delacour the inhabitant of the Lodge—see the children wondering, yet blessed in the reality, that they had a mother.

"Will you be our mama always?" said Edward; "will you never leave us?" said the sweet boy.

"Never," said Celia, "while God permits me to protect you."

"Then you will be very happy, papa," continued Edward, "for we will pray to God every night that he will spare Celia to us, and he always hears my prayers."

Lord Ellincourt paused—"What is this, Celia?" said my Lord; "should he be reproved or encouraged?"

"Encouraged, my love," said Celia; "it is the trusting confidence of a pure heart; yet in the infancy of reason, this infant moralist, I am persuaded, could adduce a reason for his implicit faith—I will try him.—Tell me, my son," said Celia, "how you are sure that God listens to your prayers?"

"Why,

"Why, he sent Mrs. Mansfield when Harriet was sick," said Edward; "and I prayed to God that you would come and be our mama, and he gave me what I wished."

Celia turned her eyes on Lord Ellincourt—"What is this?" said she.

"The beauty of holiness," said my Lord, "and the perfection of mortal happiness."

While these simple luminations of love were eliciting themselves at the Lodge, Lady Townly and the fashionable part of our heroine's acquaintance were garbling the extraordinary decision. "Ellincourt is not very young," says one; "Nor very rich," says another; "And divorced," says a third. Query, Which amongst ye would have refused him?—Not an answer! what, all mute? "He has beautiful eyes," sighs a reflecting relentor, "and fine teeth." "He is very clever," says a second, "only too moral." "But who could have thought," says the mustered coterie, "that Miss Delacour would have made such a decision?"

"She was always eccentric," says Lady Bab Blindon; "and, in truth, her discernment is impeachable, for my brother would have taken her 'with all her imperfections on her head;' but some people have no taste."

Lady Townly sat down to write a scolding letter to her sister, for having concealed so important a fact, but her anger died away as she proceeded in her epistle; and Lady Ellincourt actually wept over the tender effusion of the lively Fanny.

Mr. Belford was sincere when he declared that he participated in the happiness of Celia and Berkley; he was too generous not to feel happy in the contemplation of his friend's bliss; and too discerning, not to feel that she, who was so devoted to one man, might claim the respect of her admiring friends; but in the singleness of her her heart's preference, she not only evinced the purity of that heart, but bade her former lovers be as friends; for a wife, what is she but the reflected image of her husband? and her mind—that glows, desponds, and is every thing to the creature that it acknowledges as its head.

CHAP. IX.

"Shall I go on? or have I said enough?"

"ENOUGH, in conscience," says my reader, if a man; "I have pored over Cœlebs, and with your most impertinent Antique I am highly offended. Could not you give your heroine a 'husband,' without presuming to be severe, and lashing those who are your superiors?"

In truth, I owe ye an apology, ye bucks, beaux, and boxers of the day, not on the score of your assumptions, but that I descended to speak of ye at all—I see your ineffable contempt—I see the quizzing-glasses raised, whether in the simple frame, or as a whip; and I heed neither your visual nor your optic gaze—I know you are incorrigible, or you would call in the diurnal prints, and, instead of letting the the degrading record live, give a douceur to the publisher, and make a bonfire of your characters. But you are content with garbled praise, masked satire—I pity you, from my heart I pity you.

I am no Democrat, as I have said before; but I ask you, if your fortunes should melt, should dissolve away in the stream of dissipation, where will be your resources?—you cannot all be coachmen—we have one or two amphitheatres; but we could not engage the best boxer amongst you for more than a season; for you are experimentally informed, that novelty is necessary with an English public; and though one man may walk from Buckle's to the post, and from the post to Buckle's, we cannot bet for and against ye all—it cannot be—we are a great commercial city, and our riches are immense, but they are not inexhaustible—there are some chances in your favour; the women are credulous; there are some exceptions—now, for my own part, I would not object to give a cocher to a female cobbler; they are in an equal walk—a boxer to a charcoal artist; she understands attitude, and may produce a likeness that shall rival Gulley himself—and to a whiskered beau, I could not hesitate to give a pasteboard mechanic; she might make a bandbox for the breakable bit of mortality, and hide his whiskers even in a wig box.

"Insolent wretch!" says my reader, I mean if a man; "have we not been satirized even by the Buffos of a summer theatre, and now an insolent piece of antiquity takes up the gauntlet?"

Defy us, proud man, let your aims be such as claim our respect—it is not in nature to be perfect, but it is possible to be emulative for good. "The reputation of a man is like his shadow, it sometimes follows and sometimes precedes him; it is sometimes longer and sometimes shorter, than his usual size." Now, what could be more worthy your attempt, than to make the shadow resemble the man, as far as in your power.

power. It is grievous to behold only the shadows of coachmen, &c. &c. &c.; one naturally tires of the sameness—you know yourselves, that satiety grows out of horrid uniformity.

Look around you, observe those natives of France, whom the fatal revolution of ninety drove hither; it would be possible to find, amongst the laudably industrious of that nation, strong emanations of reason, of learning, blended even with servile callings — intellect does not disdain to lend her light to those whom poverty has benighted—but should the haggard leveller overtake you, where is your refuge? ye have been educated, but how will it elicit itself? you will gamble, forge, commit suicide—but if you are found in the path of honest industry, seeking your bread by the sweat of your brow, I am no longer an Antique, but a Hebe.

Now it is so obvious that the curtain is near falling, that I feel it necessary to say something of the remaining dramatis personæ. Sir Harry and Lady Townly rejoiced in the choice of our heroine; her Ladyship was by no means displeased that her family were yet further ennobled. Sir Harry esteemed the man, and might have said with Terence,

"I am a man, and nothing which relates to man can be foreign to my bosom."

was announced to the world as Lady Ernmore; their years were dissimilar, it is true — but how many minors do the same?

Lady Desmond, the aspiring Stanley of the day, how shall we relate her disappointment? Miss Desmond, the classic Lucilla, had acquired a taste for her studies; she never declined to decline her grammar, but declined every thing which drew her from her tutor. The mother was charmed—she saw the fair Lucilla a Countess, and, in the warmth of her heart, she imparted her scheme.

Miss Desmond wept—she fell at the feet of her mother, and, in the words of Ovid, exclaimed,

"Interdum lacryma pondera vocis habent."

"Speak English to your mama, my sweet Lucilla," said her Ladyship; "I knew you would be a scholar."

"Tears

"Tears are sometimes equal in weight to words," said Miss Desmond.

"Assuredly, my love," replied her Ladyship, "I will not say a word to Ernmore; no, he shall be surprised. What a Cœlebs have I for my Lucilla! there is an immensity of modesty in Ernmore; no one would believe he was so much your slave; but I have not a doubt but he has been with Nonft. in the store-room; and I observed, in his last call, that he took much notice of Maria."

"I have found a Cœlebs already," said Miss Desmond.—"Oh, mama, forgive me—I am married," and she embraced her mother's knees.

"Wretch!" said Lady Desmond.—"Speak! Who is he?"

"Lawford," said the young scholar.—"Indeed—indeed he is very amiable."

At this moment Lady Townly was announced—it was a fortunate intervention. Lady Desmond was full of invective. Lady Townly pleaded for the young wife, and succeeded succeeded so far, as to delay the wrath of the incensed mother, till it could be discovered whether Lawford was mercenary or not. The result was favourable to his character, and her Ladyship soon attained for the young parson an inadequate living in Somersetshire, to which the young couple gladly repaired.

"You must lend Maria to them for a short time," said Lady Townly, when she heard that Mrs. Lawford was going to the parsonage.

"Not for the world," said Lady Desmond; "I shall have her disgrace me likewise."

"But she could make puddings for the curate's family," continued Lady Townly, with a smile.

"My dear Townly," said the awakened mother, "I will henceforth adopt no new systems. Maria shall return to her former studies."

now in the habit of seeing the moral superstructure of infant education expanding to her wishes; she was not ignorant, but yielding. That pride, inseparable from mothers, made her look forward—and the prospect was hopeful—the effect was gracious—she was at peace with herself, and with the world, and she resolved to trace the feeling to its source. She did, and the decision was concise, yet comprehensive.

"Positively, my dear Townly, I cannot rest till we go to Hadley," said her Ladyship.—"I feel I owe all my happiness to Celia and aunt Martha. Nay, I am persuaded we shall yet cull some additional blossoms of scientific knowledge in the nursery of Celia."

Sir Harry was gratified by the emulation of his Lady, and soon arranged their departure.

Lady Berton had learned, from the lips of her son, the extent of that uneasiness which had wrung their maternal hearts—they did not cast him from their love—

but they owned all the sensibility that the disappointment could induce; and while they did justice to the benevolence of Celia, they readily admitted that their son was not worthy of her: their affection was extended to the child of Jessy, for whom they dispatched a confidential servant, hoping, by associating the child with his father, they might give their wretched son a motive for action, and a power to be just.

Lady Milner read the marriage of Lord Ellincourt in a daily print: her heart owned a recognition indescribable. She was now paying the forfeit of her crime, by a life of penurious wretchedness—watched, doubted, yet neglected. She addressed one letter to Celia; its contents never transpired, though, we believe, it related to her children.

Have we said enough? Whom have we neglected? Mrs. Donnel—Alas! poor Patty! she had made her fate, and, like thousands more, was ashamed to own herself deceived. A prior wife of Mr. Donnel made made her appearance; Patty was chilled with despair. Donnel did not deny it, but avowed himself to have been trepanned into it in his youth. Patty was silent—she forbore to upbraid; but taking a place in the ——— mail, she fled to Hadley; and there, ere a month had elapsed, the mourning cypress at the south of Hadley churchyard waved over her grave and her sorrows.

Once more—

"Shall I go on, or have I said enough?"

"Content," says my readers; for it is usual to flatter, in order to get rid of a person, more especially an author.

The dramas of Shakespeare live, and will live, while a taste for genius exists. The plays of modern days perish, and—I say nothing. Now I, with an humility for which I feel I deserve praise, sincerely wish my book may share the fate of a modern play, first allowing me to get my nine nights, not nine editions; and as I believe this demise of the drama to take rise in the empressement

empressement of the characters sketched, I should like (not forgetting my authorship rights) that these pages were rejected, because the dramatis personæ were so outré as to bear no resemblance to life. I know, in this case even, I shall have a little run; for you cannot discard your coaches, cut with your champions and bottle-holders, wash off your whiskers, &c. &c. &c. in a day; no, but in a little time you might humble me, as a futile caricaturist. Be true to yourselves, for God towards thee hath done his part—do thine. The women would not only smile on, but esteem you; they would love you for virtues, which, while they give lustre to the softness of their character, are at once your guard and your arms: to anticipate such an epoch, is, perhaps, too much. Ah! could I believe it possible—delightful thought! —the men would be rational, and the women neither animated, dashing, nor fascinating; but modest, humble, and religious —worthy —worthy the homage of man and the favour of Heaven.

If an author is studious, or rather zealous, in the cause of virtue; if she dares to use her eyes, and see things as they are, and is tempted to take her pen and speak a few truths, she should be indulged,; she can do no harm, provided she never outrages nature. Lord Roscommon says—

"Whatever contradicts my sense, I hate to see, and never can believe."

I must agree with him; nay, I believe this said cause of virtue to be injured by the glare of false lights. It is so evident that the people of this isle have lost some of that visual clearsightedness so necessary to mere mortality, we scarcely ever meet a pair of eyes, but goggles and glasses assail us eternally. Then nothing could be so erroneous as to place before these stumbling bling pilgrims on life's weary way, a light that should dazzle, rather than lead.

We are aspiring, but not eagles; we could not look at the sun: for my own part, if I could bask beneath the vivifying beam, and raise my eyes to the sons of men, with confidence in their stability and hope in their pursuits, I would breathe my gratitude to that orb whose silver shadow asks the reflective mind to contemplate its beam.

I have, I trust, spoken of men as they are; nor exalted women above what may be met in many a happy family.

And now, courteous reader, I will take my leave; if I have offended, I know my doom—you will term me a libeller; I shall be cast into obscurity, reviled, criticised, and, oh, heart-wounding stigma! called a ridiculous antique. Now, you know, your tastes lean that way, that antiques are the rage. Let me have a little run, and I will bear ye in remembrance; and, entre nous, it is not improbable that you may again hear from

WORKS

With the Reviewers' Opinion.

A NOVEL,

BY MISS BYRON,

"This Novel is far superior to the general run of such productions. The language is animated and correct; the characters are happily diversified, and delineated with skill; and although the story is spun out to the extent of five volumes, the attention is never tired by unnecessary circumlocution, or impertinent digression. The scenes depictured evince that the fair Authoress is no stranger to high life, nor an unprofitable observer of its predominating follies. On the whole, we can safely venture to recommend the English-Woman as a novel from the perusal of which the reader may derive both amusement and instruction."

Lady's Monthly Museum, December 1808.

OR,

MEMOIRS OF A NORTHUMBRIAN NOBLEMAN.

A Tale of the Seventeenth Century.

"This work contains an unusual degree of interest, and is very different in its construction from the general run of novels, as there is not a single love adventure throughout the whole; yet the author has ingeniously contrived to awaken attention, and keep his reader in suspense to the last page. The fate of Bertrand is rather of a sombre cast, and some of his adventures border too much on the marvellous: we can, nevertheless, venture to recommend it as an amusing and unexceptionable novel, and one with which every reader of taste and sensibility must be highly gratified."

Lady's Monthly Museum, January 1809.

A ROMANCE,

BY FRANCIS LATHOM,

3 vols. 18s. sewed.

"It would be scarcely justice to the Author, were we merely to say we think well of his production. We may honestly add, that the story abounds with interesting situations, and happy delineations of character; and that Mr. Lathom has admitted none of those common-place artifices which are now become as familiar to the readers of novels, as to the writers of them. He understands the art of concealing his catastrophe better than most of his brethren, and this without the intrusion of any abrupt, or grossly improbable circumstances We doubt not that very numerous enquiries will be made after THE UNKNOWN."

Cabinet, March, 1808.

OR,

THE MINES OF WIELITSKA.

A POLISH LEGENDARY ROMANCE.

BY T. P. LATHY.

"This story seems calculated to afford rather more entertainment than the author's Paraclete, of which we took some notice in our last year's Journal. The lovers of mysterious horrors cannot fail of being amply gratified, for our author has contrived a mode of keeping his readers in the dark, the novelty and ingenuity of which we are not able sufficiently to praise."

Literary Journal, Sept. 1806.

BY MRS. RICE.

2 vols. 7s. sewed.

"This is an interesting and amusing novel. The wonderful mingled with it does not destroy the effect of its more meritorious parts." Monthly Mirror, Dec. 1806.
